Shebbear was committed, 31 G. 2. on two warrants from the secretary of state, for a libel. 1 Burr. 640.—14. Sayer was apprehended, 18 G. 3. by warrant from the Earl of Rochford, secretary of state, for high treason, and bailed by Lord Mansfield. Black. Rep. 1165.—See farther tit. Bail, II. and also tit. Arrest.

As to the manner of commitment, it is enacted by stat. 7 G. 4. c. 64. persons taken before one or more justice or justices of the peace on a charge of felony or suspicion thereof, may be committed or bailed according to the circumstances of the cases, as they may raise a stronger or less presumption of guilt; on the examination of the witnesses the prisoner shall be taken into custody, or admitted to bail, and the witnesses bound over to prosecute and give evidence. By § 3. the duty of the magistrate in case of misdemeanor is defined; and by § 4. directions are given to § 17. This resolution was in the case of Sir

cases of homicide. See farther tit. Bail.

A justice of the peace may detain a prisoner a reasonable time, in order to examine him; and it is said, that three days is a reasonable time for this purpose. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 16. § 12: Dalt. c. 125: 2 Inst. 52. 591.

A justice may commit a woman who is a material witness on a charge of felony, and who refuses to appear or to find security; and it makes no difference that she is a feme covert. Bennet v. Watson, 1 Maul. & S. 1. A single justice has no authority to commit a woman delivered of a bastard child for refusing to answer inquiries as to who was the father of the child. Ex parte Martin, 6 Barn.

Every commitment must be in writing (see ante, last page), and under the hand and seal, and show the authority of him that made it, and the time and place, and must be directed to the keeper of the prison. It may be either in the king's name, and only attested by the justice, or in the justice's name. It may command the gaoler to keep the party in safe and close custody; for this being what he is obliged to do by law, it can be no fault to command him so to do. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 16. § 13, 14, 15.

It ought to set forth the crime with convenient certainty, whether the commitment be by the privy council, or any other authority; otherwise the officer is not punishable by reason of such mittimus for suffering the party to escape; and the court before whom he is removed by habeas corpus ought to discharge or bail him; and this doth not only hold where no cause at all is expressed in the commitment, but also where it is so loosely set forth, that the court cannot judge whether it were a reasonable ground for imprisonment or not. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 16. § 17. See tits. Arrest, Bail. But in commitments by Commissioners of Bankrupts, the court will look into the examinations themselves to see whether the Commissioners had jurisdiction. 2 B. & Adol. 410.

A commitment for high treason or felony in general, without expressing the particular species, has been held good. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 16. § 16. But now, since the habeas corpus act, it seems that such a general commitment is not good; and therefore where A. and B. were committed for aiding and abetting Sir James Montgomery to make his escape, who was committed by a warrant of a secretary of state for high treason; on a habeas corpus they were admitted to bail, because it did not appear of what species of treason Sir James was guilty. Skin. 596: 1 Salk. 347. S. C.

It is safe to set forth that the party is charged upon oath; but this is not necessary; for it hath been resolved, that a commitment for treason, or for suspicion of it, without setting forth any particular accusation or ground of the suspicion, is good. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 16.

by the secretary of state for high treason, of prisoners committed by justices of the generally. Stra. 2: 3 Vin. 515. at large. It was confirmed by Pratt, C. J. in Wilkes's case, committed by a similar warrant for a libel. 2 Wills. 158: 11 S. T. 304. And Mr. J. Foster says, in cases wherein the justice of the peace hath jurisdiction, the legality of his warrant will never depend on the truth of the information whereon it is grounded. Curtis's case, 136.

Every such mittimus ought to have a lawful conclusion, viz. that the party be safely kept till he be delivered by law, or by order of law, or by due course of law; or that he be kept till farther order (which shall be intended of the order of law), or to the like effect; and if the party be committed only for want of bail, it seems to be a good conclusion of the commitment, that he be kept till he find bail: but a commitment till the person who makes it shall take farther order, seems not to be good; and it seems that the party committed by such or any other irregular mittimus may be bailed. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 16. § 18.

Also a commitment grounded on an act of parliament ought to be conformable to the method prescribed by such statute; as where the church-wardens of Northampton were committed on the 43 Eliz. c. 2. and the warrant concluded in the common form, viz. until they be duly discharged according to law; but the statute appointing that the party should there remain until he should account, for want. of such conclusion they were discharged. Carth. 152, 153. And where a man is committed as a criminal, the conclusion must be, until he be delivered by due course of law; ii he be committed for contumacy, it should be until he comply.

II. To what Prison they may be committed; and at whose Charge.-All commitments must be to some prison within the realm of England. For,

By the stat. 31 Car. 2. c. 2. the Habeas corpus act, it is enacted, "That no subject of this realm, being an inhabitant or resiant of this kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, shall or may be sent prisoner into Scotland, Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, Tangier, or into any parts, garrisons, islands, or places beyond the seas, which then were, or at any time after should be, within or without the dominions of his Majesty."

By stat. 14 Ed. 3. c. 10. sheriffs shall have the custody of the gaols as before that time they were wont to have, and they shall put in such under-keepers for whom they will answer. And this is confirmed by stat. 19 H. 7. c. 10. Also by stat. 5 H. 4. c. 10. it is enacted, "That none be imprisoned by any justice of the peace, but only in the common gaol, saving to lords, and others who have gaols, their franchise in this case." It seems that the king's grant since the statute 5 H. 4.

W. Wyndham, 2 G. 1. who was committed c. 10. to private persons to have the custody peace is void. And it is said, that none can claim a prison as a franchise, unless he have also a gaol delivery. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 16. § 7. See stat. 11 and 12 W. 3. c. 19. § 3., made perpetual by stat. 6 G. 1. c. 19. to enable justices of the peace to build and repair gaols in their respective counties, where a clause like that in stat. 5 H. 4. c. 10. is inserted.

Also it hath been held, that regularly no one can justify the detaining a prisoner in custody out of the common gaol, unless there be some particular reason for so doing; as if the party be so dangerously sick, that it would apparently hazard his life to send him to the gaol; or there be evident danger of a rescous from rebels, &c.; yet constant practice seems to authorise a commitment to a messenger; and it is said that it shall be intended to have been made in order for the carrying of the party to gaol. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 16. § 8, 9.

And it is said, that if a constable bring a felon to gaol, and the gaoler refuse to receive him, the town where he is constable ought to keep him till the next gaol delivery. H. P. C. 114: 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 16. § 9.

A prisoner in the custody of the king's messenger, on a warrant from the secretary of state, who is brought into K. B. by habeas . corpus to be bailed, but has not his bail ready, cannot be committed to the same custody he came in; but must be committed to the custody of the marshal, which will prevent the necessity of suing out a new haheas corpus; as he may be brought up from the prison of the court, by a rule of court, whenever he shall be prepared to give bail. 1 Burr. 460.

If a person, arrested in one county for a crime done in it, fly into another county, and be retaken there, he may be committed by a justice of the first county to the gaol of such county. H. P. C. 93. But by the better opinion, if he had before any arrest fled into such county, he must be committed to the gaol thereof by a justice of such county. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 16. § 8: Dalt. c. 118. Also it seems to be laid down as a rule by some books, that any offender may be committed to the gaol next to the place where he was taken, whether it lie in the same county or not. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 16. § 8.—See post, stat. 24 G. 2. c. 55.

By stat. 6 G. 1. c. 19. vagrants and other criminals, offenders, and persons charged with small offences, may, for such offences, or for want of sureties, be committed either to the common gaol, or house of correction, as the justices in their judgment shall think proper.

By stat. 24 G. 2. c. 55. if a person is apprehended upon a warrant indorsed, in another county, for an offence not bailable, or if he shall not there find bail, he shall be carried back into the first county, and be committed, or, if bailable, bailed by the justices in such first county.

As to the charges of commitment, it is enacted by stat. 3 Jac. 1. c. 10. that offenders ! committed are to bear their own charges, and the charges of those who are appointed to guard them: and if they refuse to pay, the charges may be levied by sale of their goods. And by stat. 27 G. 2. c. 3. if they have no goods, &c. within the county where they are apprehended, the justices are to grant a warrant on the treasurer of the county for payment of the charges. But in Middlesex the same shall be paid by the overseers of the poor of the parish where the person was apprehended.

III. How they may be removed and discharged .- As prisoners ought to be committed at first to the proper prison, so ought they not to be removed thence, except in some special cases; and to this purpose it is enacted by 31 Car. 2. c. 2. "that if any subject of this realm shall be committed to any prison, or in custody of any officer or officers whatsoever, for any criminal, or supposed criminal matter, that the said person shall not be removed from the said prison and custody, into the custody of any other officer or officers, unless it be by habeas corpus, or some other legal writ; or where the prisoner is delivered to the constable or other inferior officer, to carry such prisoner to some gaol; or where any person is sent by order of any judge of assize, or justice of the peace, to any common workhouse, or house of correction; or where the prisoner is removed from one prison or place to another within the same county, in order to a trial or discharge by due course of law; or in case of sudden fire or infection, or other necessity; upon pain that he who makes out, signs, or countersigns, or obeys, or executes such warrant, shall forfeit to the party grieved 100l. for the first offence, 200l. for the second, &c. Hawk. P. C. c. 16. § 10.

A person legally committed for a crime, certainly appearing to have been done by some one or other, cannot be lawfully discharged by any other but by the king, till he be acquitted on his trial, or have an ignoramus found by the grand jury, or none to prosecute him on a proclamation for that purpose, by the justices of gaol delivery. But if a person be committed on a bare suspicion, without any appeal or indictment, for a supposed crime, where afterwards it appears that there was none; as for the murder of a person thought to be dead, who afterwards is found to be alive, it hath been holden that he may be safely dismissed without any farther proceeding; for that he who suffers him to escape, is properly punishable only as an accessory to his supposed offence; and it is impossible there should be an accessory where there can be no principal; and it would be hard to punish one for a contempt founded on a suspicion appearing in so uncontested a manner to be groundless. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 16. § 22. But the safest way for the gaoler is to have the authority of some court or the property of the soil is generally in the magistrate, for discharging the prisoner.

If the words of a statute are not pursued in a commitment, the party shall be discharged by habeas-corpus. See tits. Bail, Imprisonment, Prisoner, &c.

COMMONALTY, populus, plebs, communitas.] In Art. super chartas, 28 Ed. 1. c. 1. the words Tout le Commune d' Engleterre signify all the people of England. 2 Inst.

But this word is generally used for the middle sort of the king's subjects, such of the commons as are raised beyond the ordinary sort, and coming to have the managing of officers, by that means are one degree under burgesses, which are superior to them in order and authority; and companies incorporated are said to consist of masters, wardens, and commonalty, the first two being the chief. and the others such as are usually called of the livery. The ordinary people, and freeholders, or at best knights and gentlemen. under the degree of baron, have been of late years called communitas regni, or tota terræ communitas; yet anciently, if we credit Brady, the barons and tenants in capite or military men, were the community of the king. dom; and those only were reputed as such in our most ancient histories and records. Brady's Gloss. to his Introduct. to Engl. Hist.

COMMON, Communia.] A right or privilege, which one or more persons claim to take or use, in some part or portion of that which another man's lands, waters, woods, &c. do naturally produce; without having an absolute property in such lands, waters, woods, &c. It is called an incorporcal right, which lies in grant, as if originally commencing on some agreement between lords and tenants, for some valuable purposes: which by age being formed into a prescription continues, although there be no deed or instrument in writing which proves the original contract or agreement. 4 Co. 37: 2 Inst. 65: 1 Vent. 387.

By the 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 71. after thirty years' enjoyment, a right of common cannot be defeated, by merely showing that it commenced within time of memory; and after sixty years' enjoyment the right shall be absolute.

- II. The Interest of the Owner of the Soil; wherein, of Approvement and Inclo-
- III. The Commoners' Interest in the Soil; and herein, of Apportionment and Extinguishment.
- I. Of the several Kinds of Commons .-There is not only common of pasture, but also common of piscary or fishing; common of estovers; common of turbary, which see under their several heads. The word common, however, in its most usual acceptation, signifies common of pasture. This is a right of feeding one's beast on another's land: for in those waste grounds, usually called commons, lord of the manor, as in common fields it is in the particular tenants. This kind of com- town cannot then common: but though the mon is divided into common gross, common appendant, common appurtenant, and common per cause de vicinage.

Common in gross is a liberty to have common alone, without any lands or tenements, in another person's land, granted by deed to a man and his heirs, or for life, &c. F. N. B. 31. 37: 4 Rep. 30.

Common appendant is a right belonging to a man's arable land, of putting beasts commonable into another's ground. And common appurtenant is belonging to an estate for all manner of beasts commonable or not commonable. 4 Rep. 37: Plowd. 161.

Common appendant and appurtenant are in a manner confounded, as appears by Fitzherbert; and are by him defined to be a liberty of common appertaining to, or depending on, a freehold; which common must be taken with beasts commonable, as horses, oxen, Rine, and sheep; and not with goats, hogs, and geese. But some make this difference, that common appurtenant may be severed from the land whereto it pertains; but not common appendant; which, according to Sir Edward Coke, had this beginning: when a lord enfcoffed another of arable land to hold of him in socage, the feoffee to maintain the service of his plough, had, at first, by the courtesy or permission of the lord, common in his wastes for necessary beasts to eat and compost his land, and that for two causes; one, for that it was tacitly implied in the feoffment, by reason the feoffee could not till or compost his land without cattle, and cattle could not be sustained without pasture; so by consequence, the feoffee had, as a thing necessary and incident, common in the waste and lands of the lord: and this may be collected from the ancient books and statutes: and the second reason of this common was, for the maintenance and advantage of tillage, which is much regarded and favoured by the law. F. N. B. 180: 4 Rep. 37.

Common per cause de vicinage, common by reason of neighbourhood; is a liberty that the tenants of one lord in one town have to common with the tenants of another lord in another town: it is where the tenants of two lords have used, time out of mind, to have common promiscuously in both lordships lying together and open to one another. 8 Rep. 78. And those that challenge this kind of common, which is usually called intercommoning, may not put their cattle in the common of the other lord, for then they are distrainable; but they may turn them into their own fields, and if they stray into the neighbouring common they must be suffered. Terms de la Ley. The inhabitants of one town or lordship may not put in as many beasts as they will, but with regard to the freehold of the inhabitants of the other: for otherwise it were no good neighbourhood, upon which all this depends.

If one lord encloses the common, the other common of vicinage is gone, common appendant remains. 4 Rep. 38: 7 Rep. 5. Every common per cause de vicinage is a common appendant. 1 Danv. Abr. 799.

This is indeed only a permissive right intended to excuse what in strictness is a trespass in both, and to prevent a multiplicity of suits. And therefore either township may inclose and bar out the other, though they have intercommoned time out of mind. 2

Comm. 34.

Common appendant is only to ancient arable land; not to a house, meadow, pasture, &c. It is against the nature of common appendant to be appendant to meadow or pasture: but if in the beginning land be arable, and of late a house hath been built on some part of the land, and some acres are employed to meadow and pasture, in such case it is appendant; though it must be pleaded as appendant to the land, and not to the house, pasture, &c. 1 Nels. Abr. 457. This may be common appendant, though it belongs to a manor, farm, or plough-land: and common appendant is of common right: but it is not common appendant unless it has been appendant time out of mind. 1 Danv. 746. It may be upon condition; be for all the year, or for a certain time, or for a certain number of beasts, &c. by usage: though it ought to be for such cattle as plough and compost the land to which it is appendant. Ibid. 797. Common appendant may be to common in a field after the corn is severed, till the ground is re-sown: so it may be to have common in a meadow after the hay is carried off the same, till candlemas, &c. Yelv. 185.

This common, which is in its nature without number, by custom may be limited as to the beastse common appurtenant ought always to be for those levant and couchant, and may be sans number. Plowd. 161. A man may prescribe to have common appurtenant for all manner of cattle, at every season in the year. 25 Ass. 8. Common by prescription for all manner of commonable cattle as belonging to a tenement, &c. must be for cattle levant and couchant upon the land (which is so many as the land will maintain), or it will not be good: and if a person grants common sans number, the grantce cannot put in so many cattle, but that the grantor may have sufficient common in the same land. 1 Danv. Abr. 798, 799. He who hath common appendant or appurtenant, can keep but a number of cattle proportionable to his land; for he can common with no more than the land to which his common belongs is able to maintain. 3 Salk. 93. Common appurtenant may be to a house, pasture, &c., though common appendant cannot; but it ought to be prescribed for as against common right: and uncommonable cattle, as hogs, goats, &c. are appurtenant: this common may be created by grant at this day; so may not common appendant. 1 Inst. 122: 1 Rol. Abr. 398.

of beasts may be granted over. 1 Danv.

In Scotland, in those districts where there is no coal, the inhabitants are chiefly supplied with fuel from the mosses with which the country abounds. Where one estate has only a small quantity of this moss, it is not unusual for the proprietor of a neighbouring estate, where there is a superfluity, to sell to the proprietor of the defective estate a perpetual liberty to his tenants to cut moss for fuel, on a certain annual rent, per fine or finnilty (which terms are synonymous), and this is called "an heritable moss tolerance." Dingwall v. Farquharson, Dom. Proc. Journals, 1797.

II. The Interest of the Owner of the Soil; wherein of Approvement and Inclosure.—The property of the soil in the common is entirely in the lord; and the use of it jointly in him and the commoners. The lord may, in respect of his interest in the soil of the waste commonable lands, have a right of common over common lands of another manor. Sefton v. Court, 5 Barn. & C. 921. And see 5 Taunt. 365: 1 Marsh. 50. A lord is entitled under an inclosure act to an allotment in respect of the demesnes of the manor over and above the allotment awarded to him by the act in respect of his rights as lord. Arundel v. Falmouth, 2 Maul. S. S. 440.

Lords of manors may depasture in commons where their tenants put in cattle; and a prescription to exclude the lord is against law. 1 Inst. 122.

The lord may agist the cattle of a stranger in the common by prescription; and he may license a stranger to put in his cattle, if he leaves sufficient room for the commoners. Danv. 795: 2 Mod. 6. Also the lord may surcharge, &c. an overplus of the common; and if, where there is not an overplus, the lord surcharges the common, the commoners are not to distrain his beast, but must commence an action against the lord. F. N. B. 125. But it is said, if the lord of the soil put cattle into a close, contrary to custom, when it ought to lie fresh, a commoner may take the cattle damage-feasant; otherwise it is a general rule that he cannot distrain the cattle of the lord. 1 Danv. 807.

The lord may distrain where the common is surcharged, and bring action of trespass for any trespass done in the common. 9 Rep.

A lord may make a pond on the common; though the lord cannot dig pits for gravel or coal, the statutes of approvement extending only to inclosure. 3 Inst. 204: 9 Rep. 112: 1 Sid. 106. If the lord makes a warren on the common, the commoners may not kill the conies; but are to bring their action, for they may not be their own judges. 1 Rol. 90. 405

The right of commoners in the common

Common appurtenant for a certain number | may be subservient to the right of the lord in the soil, so that the lord may dig claypits there, or empower others so to do, without leaving sufficient herbage for the commoners, it such a right can be proved to have been always exercised by the lord. 5 T. R. 411.

> So that the lord may, with the consent of the Homage, grant part of the soil of the common for building, if he has immemorially exercised such a right. 5 T. R. 417. n.

> By stat. 20 H. 3. c. 4. (Stat. of Merton.) lords may approve against their tenants, viz. inclose part of the waste, &c., and thereby discharge it from being common, leaving common sufficient; and neighbours as well as tenants, claiming common of pasture, shall be bound by it. If the lord incloses on the common, and leaves not common sufficient, the commoners may not only break down the inclosures, but may put in their cattle, although the lord ploughs and sows the land. 2 Inst. 88: 1 Rol. Abr. 406.

> Where the tenants of the manor have a right to dig gravel on the wastes, or to take estovers, there the lord has no right, under the stat. of Merton, to inclose and approve the wastes of the manor.-Yet a custom in a manor that any person being desirous of inclosing, may apply to the court, &c., first obtaining the consent of the lord, does not abridge the lord's common law-right of inclosing without any such application, provided he leave common sufficient for the tenants. 2 T. R. 391, 392.

> Any person who is seised in fee of part of a waste within a manor may approve, leaving a sufficiency of common, though he be not lord of the manor. 3 T. R. 445.

> The lord of a manor, or his grantee, may inclose and approve part of a common, against tenants having common of pasture, notwithstanding they have also some other right on the common, as a right to dig for sand, &c., if he leave sufficient common of pasture. 6 T. R. 741.

> An unqualified custom for the lord of the manor to inclose the waste is bad; but a custom to inclose, leaving a sufficiency of common, is good, even, as it seems, against common of turbary; but it lies on the lord to show that a sufficiency is left. A commoner may throw down the whole of a fence inclosing any part of the common wrongfully erected, even by the lord. Arlett v. Ellis, 7 B. & C. 340.

> There can be no approvement by the lord in derogation of a right of common of turbary. 1 Taunt. 435. sed vide last case.

> By stats. 31 G. 2. c. 41: 22 G. 3. c. 36. owners of common, with the consent of the majority, in number and value, of the commoners; the majority of the commoners, with consent of the owners; or any persons with the consent of both, may inclose any part of a common for the growth of wood.
> By stat. 13 Geo. 3. c. 81. § 21. rams are not gust to the 25th of November.

III. The Commoners' Interest in the Soil; and herein of Apportionment and Extinguishment.—A commoner hath only a special and limited interest in the soil, but yet he shall have such remedies as are commensurate to his right, and therefore may distrain beasts damage-feasant, bring an action on the case, &c.; but not being absolute owner of the soil, he cannot bring a general action of trespass for a trespass done upon the common. See Bridg. 10, 11: Godb. 123, 124: 2 Leon. 201, 202.

Common for cattle levant and couchant cannot be claimed by prescription as appurtenant to a house without any curtilage or land. Scholes v. Hargrave, 5 T. R. 46. And see 8 T. R. 396.

A commoner cannot regularly do any thing on the soil which tends to the melioration or improvement of the common, as cutting down of bushes, fern, &c. 1 Sid. 251: 12 H. 8. c. 2: 13 H. 8. c. 115. Therefore if a common every year in a flood is surrounded with water, the commoner cannot make a trench in the soil to avoid the water, because he has nothing to do with the soil, but only to take the grass with the mouth of the cattle. Rol. Abr. 405: 2 Bulst. 116.—But see ante, II. and post.

Every commoner may break the common if it be inclosed; and although he does not put his cattle in at the time, yet his right of commonage shall excuse him from being a trespasser. Lit. Rep. 38. See 1 Rol. Abr. 406. That is, supposing the inclosure made by the lord, and that there is not sufficient common; or that the inclosure is made by any other person than the lord.

A commoner cannot justify cutting down trees planted by the lord on the waste though there be not sufficiency of common left; but his remedy is by action on the case, or by assize. 6 T. R. 483. (Affirmed in Cam. Scacc. 1 B. & P. 13.)

If a tenant of a freehold ploughs it, and sows it with corn, the commoner may put in his cattle, and therewith eat the corn growing upon the land; so if he lets his corn lie in the field beyond the usual time, the other commoners may notwithstanding put in their beasts. 2 Leon. 202, 203.

The commoner cannot use common but with his own proper cattle; but if he hath not any cattle to manure the land, he may borrow other cattle to manure it, and use the common with them; for by the loan, they are in a manner made his own cattle. 1 Danv. 798. Grantee of common appurtenant, for a certain number of cattle, cannot common with the cattle of a stranger; he that hath common in gross, may put in a stranger's cattle, and use the common with such cattle. Ibid. 803. Common appendant or appurtenant cannot be erroneously, occasioned this unmeasured right to remain on commons from the 25th of Au- | made common in gross; and approvement extends not to common in gross. 2 Inst. 86.

A commoner may distrain beasts put into the common by a stranger, or every commoner may bring action of the case, where damage is received. 9 Rep. 11. But one commoner cannot distrain the cattle of another commoner, though he may those of a stranger, who hath no right to the common. 2 Lutw.

Wherever there is colour of right for putting in cattle, a commoner cannot distrain; where there is no colour he may: so he may distrain a stranger's cattle, but not those of a commoner, though he exceeds his number. Where writ of admeasurement lies, he cannot distrain.—Quære, whether he may distrain cattle surcharged, where the right of common is for a number certain. 4 Burr. 2426: 1 Black. Rep. 673.

The usual remedies for surcharging the common are either by distraining so many of the beasts as are above the number allowed, or else by an action of trespass; both which may be had by the lord; or, lastly, by a special action on the case for damages, in which any commoner may be plaintiff. Freem. 273. But the ancient and most effectual method of proceeding is by writ of admeasurement of pasture. This lies, either where a common appurtenant or in gross is certain as to number, or where a man has common appendant or appurtenant to his land, the quantity of which common has never yet been ascertained. In either of these cases, as well the lord as any of the commoners, is entitled to this writ of measurement; which is one of those writs that are called vicontiel (2 Inst. 369: Finch. L. 314), being directed to the sheriff (vicecomiti), and not to be returned to any superior court till finally executed by him.

It recites a complaint, that the defendant hath surcharged (superoneravit) the common; and therefore commands the sheriff to admeasure and apportion it; that the defendant may not have more than belongs to him, and that the plaintiff may have his rightful share. And upon this suit all the commoners shall be admeasured, as well those who have not as those who have surcharged the common; as well the plaintiff as defendant. F. N. B. 125. The execution of this writ must be by a jury of twelve men, who are upon their oaths to ascertain, under the superintendance of the sheriff, what and how many cattle each commoner is entitled to feed. And the rule for this admeasurement is generally understood to be, that the commoner shall not turn more cattle upon the common than are sufficient to manure and stock the land to which his right of common is annexed; or, as our ancient law expresses it, such cattle as only are levant and couchant upon his tenement (Bro. Abr. 1. Prescription 28); which being a thing uncertain before admeasurement, has frequently, though of common to be called a common without, against the owner. Cro. Jac. 195. This kind of stint, or sans nombre (Hardr. 117), a thing which, though possible in law, does in fact very rarely exist. Lord Raym. 407.

If, after the admeasurement has thus ascertained the right, the same defendant surcharges the common again, the plaintiff may have a writ of second surcharge (de secunda superoneratione), which is given by the stat. Westm. 2. 13 Ed. 1. c. 8; and thereby the sheriff is directed to inquire, by a jury, whether the defendant has, in fact, again surcharged the common, contrary to the tenor of the last admeasurement; and if he has, he shall then forfeit to the king the supernumerary cattle put in, and also shall pay damages to the plaintiff. F. N. B. 126: 2 Inst. 370. This process seems highly equitable, for the first offence is held to be committed through mere inadvertence, and therefore there are no damages or forfeiture on the first writ, which was only to ascertain the right which was disputed; but the second offence is a wilful contempt and injustice, and therefore punished, very properly, with not only damages, but also forfeiture. And herein the right, being once settled, is never again disputed; but only the fact is tried, whether there be any second surcharge or no; which gives this neglected proceeding a great ad- have an action for the injury, by entering on vantage over the modern method by action the common, &c. 1 Rol. 1br. 89. 398: 2 Leon. on the case, wherein the quantum of common belonging to the defendant must be proved upon every fresh trial, for every repeated offence.

This injury, by surcharging, can, properly speaking, only happen where the common is appendant or appurtenant, and of course limited by law; or where, when in gross, it is expressly limited and certain; for where a man hath common in gross, sans nombre, or without stint, he cannot be a surcharger. However, even where a man is said to have common without stint, still there must be left sufficient for the lord's own beasts. 1 Rol. Abr. 399. For the law will not suppose that, at the original grant of the common, the lord meant to exclude himself.

One commoner who has surcharged may nevertheless maintain an action against another for surcharging the common. 4 T. R. 471.

There is yet another disturbance of common, when the owner of the land, or other person, so incloses or otherwise obstructs it, that the commoner is precluded from enjoying the benefit, to which he is by law entitled. This may be done either by creeting fences, or by driving the cattle off the land, or by ploughing up the soil of the common. Cro. Eliz. 198. Or it may be done by erecting a warren therein, and stocking it with rabbits in such quantities, that they devour the whole herbage, and thereby destroy the common. For in such case, though the commoner may not destroy the rabbits, yet the law looks upon this as an injurious disturbance of his right, and has given him his remedy by action mon, which destroys the grass, and carrying disturbance does indeed amount to a disseisin. and if the commoner chooses to consider it in that light, the law has given him an assise of novel disscisin, against the lord, to recover the possession of his common. F. N. B. 179.— Or it has given a writ of quod permittat against any stranger as well as the owner of the land. in case of such a disturbance to the plaintiff as amounts to a total deprivation of his com. mon: whereby the defendant shall be compelled to vermit the plaintiff to enjoy his com. mercus he ought. Finch. L. 275: F. N. B. 123. But if the commoner does not choose to bring a real action to recover seisin, or to try the right, he may (which is the easier and more usual way) bring an action on the case for his damages, instead of an assise, or a quod permittat. Cro. Jac. 195. See 3 Comm. 238.

Twenty years adverse possession of a waste inclosed is a bar to the entry of a commoner. 2 Taunt. 156: 2 B. & C. 921.

If any commoner incloses, or builds on the common, every commoner may have an action for the damage. Where turf is taken away from the common, the lord only is to bring the action: but it is said the commoners may 201.

If a commoner who hath a freehold in his common be ousted of, or hindered therein, that he cannot have it so beneficially as he used to do; whether the interruption be by the lord or any stranger, he may have an assise against him; but if the commoner hath only an estate for years, then his remedy is by action on the case. And if it be only a small trespass, that is little or no loss to the commoner, but he hath common enough besides, the commoner may not bring any action. 4 Rep. 37: 8 Rep. 79: Dyer, 316.

A commoner may maintain an action on the case for an injury done to the common by taking away from thence the manure which was dropped on it by the cattle: though his proportion of the damage amount only to a farthing: at least the smallness of the damage found is no ground for a nonsuit. 2 T. R. 154.

In an action for disturbance of plaintiff's common, if the declaration state that plaintiff is possessed of a messuage and land, and by reason thereof ought to have common, the allegation is divisible, and proof that plaintiff is possessed of land only, and a right of common in respect of it is sufficient. Rickets v. Salwey, 2 Barn. & A. 360.

Plaintiff claimed a right of common for all commonable cattle: the proof was that he had turned on all the commonable cattle he kept, but that he had never kept sheep. This is evidence for the jury to prove the right claimed. 4 Barn. & Cres. 161.

A commoner cannot dig clay on the comit away doth damage to the ground; so that common appendant for a certain number of the other commoners cannot enjoy the common, in tam amplo modo as they ought. Godb. Also a commoner may not cut bushes, dig trenches, &c. in the common, without a custom to do it. 1 Nels. 462. If he makes any thing de novo he is a trespasser: he can do nothing to impair the common; but may reform a thing abused, fill up holes, &c. 1 Browl. 208.

A commoner may abate hedges erected on a common; for though the lord hath an interest in the soil by abating the hedges, the commoner doth not meddle with it. 2 Mod. 65: 7 B. & C. 340. Any man may by prescription have common and feeding for his cattle in the king's highway, though the soil doth belong to another. But the occupation of common by usurpation, will not give title to him that doth occupy it, unless he hath had it time beyond memory.

Upon agreement between two commoners to inclose a common, a party having interest not privy to the agreement, will not be bound; but one or two wilful persons shall not hinder the public good. Chan. Rep. 48. Commons must be driven yearly at Michaelmas, or within fifteen days after: infected horses, and stone-horses under size, &c. are not to be put into commons, under forfeitures by stat. 32 H. 8. c. 13. New erected cottages, though they have four acres of ground laid to them, ought not to have common in the waste. 2 Inst. 740. In law proceedings, where there are two distinct commons, the two titles must be shown; cattle are to be alleged commonable; and common ought to be in lands commonable: and the place is to be set forth where the messuage and lands lie, &c. to which the common belongs. 1 Nels. 462, 463.

Common appendant, because it is of common right, shall be apportioned by the commoner's purchase of part of the land in which he hath such common; but common apurtenant shall be extinct by the commoner's purchase of part of the land, in which, &c. Both common appendant and appurtenant shall be apportioned by alleviation of part of the land to which the common is appendant or appurtenant. Co. Lit. 122: Hob. 235: 8 Co. 78: Owen, 122: 4 Co. 37: Cro. Eliz.

A release of common in one acre is an extinguishment of the whole common. See 4

If A. hath common in the lands of B. as appurtenant to a messuage, and after B. enfeoffs A. of the said lands, whereby the common is extinguished; and then A. leases to B. the said messuage and lands, with all commons, &c. used or occupied with the said messuage; this is a good grant of a new common for the time. Cro. Eliz. 570. If several persons are seised of several parts of a common, and a commoner purchases the inheritance of one part, his entire common is restrained by special covenant; and every teextinct. 1 And. 159. When a man hath nant for years hath three kinds of estovers cattle, and to a certain parcel of land, if he sell part of it, the common is not extinguished; for the purchaser shall have common pro rata: but it is otherwise in common appurtenant. 8 Rep. 78: 1 Nels. 460.

By stat. 13 G. 3. c. 81. in every parish where there are common field dands, all the arable lands lying in such fields shall be cultivated by the occupiers, under such rules as 3-4ths of them in number and value, (with the consent of the land and tithe owners, [the latter not to receive any fines, only rents. § 23.) shall appoint by writing under their hands: the expence to be borne proportionably, § 1, 2. 4. 7.—Under the management of a field-master, or field reeve, to be appointed annually in May. § 3. 5, 6.

Persons having right of common, but not having land in such fields, and persons having sheep-walks, may compound for such right, by written agreement, or may, with their consent, have parts allotted them to common upon; § 8, 9, 10; and the balks, slades, and meres may be ploughed up, § 11-14.

Lords of manors, with the consent of 3-4ths of the commoners, on the wastes and commons within their manors, may demise (for not more than four years) any part of such wastes, &c. not exceeding 1-12th part; and the clear rents reserved for the same, shall be applied in improving the residue of such wastes. § 14.

In every manor where there are stinted commons, in lieu of demising part thereof, assessments on the lords of such manors, and the owners and occupiers of such commons may be made, and the money employed in the improvement of the commons, under the direction of the majority; which (or in some instances 2-3ds) may regulate the depasturing, opening, shutting-up, breaking, and unstocking the commons, and the kind of cattle to be allowed the commoners. § 16.

All rights relative to commons, previous to this act, are saved, except as against persons who became subject to regulations made under the statute. § 27.

Dig. and Bac. Ab. tit. Common. (7th ed.) COMMON OF ESTOVERS, or estouviers, that is, necessaries, from estoffer to furnish.] liberty of taking necessary wood for the use or furniture of a house, or farm, from off another's estate. 2 Comm. 35. Or in the language of the law, for house-bote, plough-bote, and hay-bote. See tit. Bote. What botes are necessary tenants may take, notwithstanding no mention be made thereof in their leases; but if a tenant make more house-bote than is needful, he may be punished for waste. Terms de la Ley. Tenant for life may take upon the land demised reasonable estovers, unless incident to his estate. 1 Inst. 41. When a These several species of common do, howhouse, having estovers appendant or appurted ever, all originally result from the same nenant, is blown down by wind, if the owner rebuilds it in the same place and manner as before, his estovers shall continue: so if he alters the rooms and chambers, without making new chimneys; but if he erect any new chimneys, he will not be allowed to spend any estovers in such new chimneys. 4 Rep. 87: 4 Leon. 383. If one have a dwelling-house whereunto common of estovers doth belong, and the house by fire is burnt down, and a new one built near to the place, or in the place in another form, the estovers are gone: but if the old house be only some of it down, it is otherwise; and in all cases where the alterations to a house do no prejudice to the tertenant or owner of the land or wood, the estovers will remain. F. N. B. 180. Where a man hath estovers for life, if the owner cut down all the wood, that there is none left for him, he may bring an assise of estovers; and if the tenant have but an estate for years, or at will, he may have an action on the case. Moor. Ca. 65: 9 Rep. 112. If the tenant who hath common of estovers, shall use them to any other purpose than he ought, he that owns the wood may bring trespass against him: as where one grants twenty loads of wood to be taken yearly in such a wood ten loads to burn, and ten to repair pales; here he may cut and take the wood for the pales, though they need no amending; but then he must keep it for that use. 9 Rep. 113: F. N. B. 58. 159.

COMMON OF PASTURAGE, is the right of pasturing the goods and cattle of the dominant tenement, upon the ground of the servient.

Scotch Dict.

COMMON OF PISCARY, is a liberty of fishing in another man's water. Common of Piscary to exclude the owner of the soil, is contrary to law: though a person by prescription may have a separate right of fishing in such water, and the owner of the soil be excluded; for a man may grant the water, without passing the soil; and if one grant separaliam piscariam, neither the soil nor the water pass, but only a right of fishing. 1 Inst. 4. 122. 164: 5 Rep. 34. See Fish and Fishery.

COMMON OF TURBARY, is a license to dig turf upon the ground of another, or in the lord's waste. This common is appendant or appurtenant to a house, and not to lands; for turfs are to be burnt in the house; and it may be in gross; but it does not give any right to the land, trees, or mines. It cannot exclude the owner of the soil. 1 Inst. 4. 122: 4 Rep.

There is also a common of digging for coals, minerals, stones, and the like. All these bear a resemblance to common of pasture in many respects; though in one point they go much farther; common of pasture being only a right of feeding on the herbage or vesture! of the soil which renews annually; but common of turbary, and those just mentioned, are a right of carrying away the very soil itself.—

cessity as common of pasture, viz. for the maintenance and carrying on of husbandry: common of piscary being given for the sus-tenance of the tenant's family; common of turbary and fire-bote for his fuel; and house-bote, plough-bote, cart-bote, and hedge-bote, for repairing his house, his instruments of tillage, and the necessary fences of his grounds. 2 Comm. 34, 35.

COMMON BENCH, Bancus communis, from the Sax. banc, bank, and thence metaphorically a bench, high seat or tribunal.] The Court of Common Pleas was anciently called Common Bench, because the pleas of controversies between common persons were there tried and determined. COMMON FINE, finis communis.] A small sum of money, which the resiants within the liberty of some leets pay to the lords, called in divers places head silver or head pence, in others cert money; and was first granted to the lord, towards the charge of his purchase of the court-leet, whereby the resiants have the ease to do their suit within their own manors, and are not compellable to go to the sheriff's turn: in the manor of Sheepshead in the county of Leicester, every resiant pays 1d. per poll to the lord at the court held after Michaelmas, which is there called common fine. For this common fine the lord may distrain: but he cannot do it without a prescription. 11 Rep. 44. There is also common fine of the county. See Fleta, lib. 7. c. 48. and stat. 3 Ed. 1. c. 18.

COMMON INTENDMENT, is common meaning or understanding, according to the subject matter, not strained to any extraordinary or foreign sense: bar to common intendment is an ordinary or general bar, which is commonly an answer to the plaintiff's declaration. COMMON LAW, Lex Communis.]

taken for the law of this kingdom simply, preservation of the peace: and this is what without any other laws; as it was generally holden before any statute was enacted in par-liament to alter the same; and the king's courts of justice are called the Common Law Courts. The Common Law is grounded upon the general customs of the realm; and includes in it the law of nature, the law of God, and the principles and maxims of the law; it is founded upon reason; and is said to be the perfection of reason, acquired by long study, observation, and experience, and refined by learned men in all ages. And it is the common birth-right that the subject hath for the safeguard and defence, not only of his goods, lands, and revenues; but of his wife and children, body, fame, and life also. Co. Lit. 97. 142: Treatise of Laws, p. 2.

According to Hale, the common law of England is the common rule for administering justice within this kingdom, and asserts the king's royal prerogatives, and likewise the rights and liberties of the subject: it is generally that law, by which the determinations in the king's ordinary courts are guided; and this directs the course of descents of lands; the nature, extent, and qualification of estates; and therein the manner and ceremonies of conveying them from one to another; with the forms, solemnities, and obligation of contracts; the rules and directions for the exposition of deeds and acts of parliament; the process, proceedings, judgments, and executions of our courts of justice; also the limits and bounds of courts, and jurisdictions; the several kinds of temporal offences and punishments, and their application, &c. Hale's Hist. of the Common Law, p. 24. 44, 45.

As to the rise of the common law, this account is given by some ancient writers: after the decay of the Roman empire, three sorts of the German people invaded the Britons, viz. the Saxons, the Angles, and the Jutes; from the last sprung the Kentish men, and the inhabitants of the Isle of Wright; from the Saxons came the people called the East, South, and West Saxons; and from the Angles, the East Angles, Mercians, and Northumbrians. These people having different customs, they inclined to the different laws by which their ancestors were governed; but the customs of the West Saxons and Mercians, who dwelt in the midland counties, being preferred before the rest, were for that reason called jus Anglorum; and by these laws those people were governed for many ages: but the East Saxons having afterwards been subdued by the Danes, their customs were introduced, and a third law was substituted, which was called Dane lage; as the other was then styled West Saxon lage, &c.

At length the Danes being overcome by the Normans, William called the Conqueror, upon consideration of all those laws and customs, abrogated some, and established others; to which he added some of his own country laws, which he judged most to conduce to the

we now call the common law.

But though we usually date our common law from hence, this was not the original of the common law; for Ethelbert, the first Christian king of this nation, made the first Saxon laws, which were published by the advice of some wise men of his council: and King Alfred, who lived 300 years afterwards, collected all the Saxon laws into one book, and commanded them to be observed through the whole kingdom, which before only affected certain parts thereof; and it was therefore properly called the common law, because it was common to the whole nation: and soon after it was called the folc-right, i. e. the people's right.

Alfred was styled Anglicarum legum con ditor: and when the Danes, on the conquest of the kingdom, had introduced their laws, they were afterwards destroyed; and Edward the Confessor out of the former laws composed a body of the common law; wherefore he is called by our historians Anglicarum legum restitor. Blount. In the reign of Edw. 1. Britton wrote his learned book of the common law of this realm; which was done by the king's command, and runs in his name, answerable to the Institutions of the Civil Law, which Justinian assumes to himself, though composed by others. Staundf. Prerog. 6.21. But Justinian ought to be entitled to the honor, as the Institutes were composed by his direction. This Britton is mentioned by Gwin to have been bishop of Hereford.

Bracton, a great lawyer, in the time of Hen. III. wrote a very learned treatise of the common law of England, held in great estimation; and he was said to be lord chief justice of the kingdom. Also the famous and learned Glanvil, lord chief justice in the reign of Hen. II. wrote a book of the common law, which is said to be the most ancient composition extant on that subject. Besides these, in the time of Ed. IV. the renowned lawyer Littleton wrote his excellent book of English Tenures. In the reign of King James the First, the great oracle of the law, Sir Edward Coke, published his learned and laborious Institutes of our law, and commentary on Littleton. About the same time likewise Dr. Cowel, a civilian, wrote a short Institute of our laws. In the reign of King George the First, Dr. Tho. Wood, a civilian and common lawyer, and at last a divine, wrote an Institute of the laws of England, which is something after the manner of the Institutes of the Civil Law.

To conclude the whole of this head, the late learned judge Blackstone in the reign of George the Third, published his Commenta-ries on the Laws of England, the best analytic and most methodic system of our laws which ever was published. It is equally adapted for the use of students, and of those gentlemen who choose to acquire that knowledge of our laws which is, in fact, essentially necessary for every one. See particularly COMMON PLEAS, communia placita.]— Is one of the king's courts now constantly held in Westminster Hall; but in ancient time was moveable, as appears by Magna Charta, cap. 11. Before this charter, of King John and Henry III. there were but two courts, called the King's Court, viz. the King's Bench and the Exchequer, which were then styled Curia Domini Regis, and Aula Regis, because they followed the court of the king: and upon the grant of the great charter the court of Common Pleas was erected and settled in one certain place, i. e. Westminster Hall; and after that all the writs ran Quod sit coram justiciariis meis apud Westm.; whereas before, the party was required by them to appear Coram me vel justiciariis meis, without any addition of place, &c. But Sir Edward Coke is of opinion, in his preface to the eighth report, and I Inst. 71. b. that the court of Common Pleas existed as a distinct court before the Conquest; and was not created by Magna Charta, at which time there were Justiciarii de Banco, &c. Though before this act Common Pleas might have been held in Banco regis; and all original writs were returnable there.

According to Madox the origin of the court of Common Pleas is of a much later date than that assigned by Lord Coke. He so far agrees with Lord Coke as to admit that the Magna Charta of Hen. III. rather confirmed than erected the Bank or Common Pleas; and that such a court was in being several years before the Magna Charta of 17 of King John, though it was then first made stationary: but in other respects Lord Coke and Mr. Madox differ widely; for the latter thinks that some time after the conquest there was one great and supreme judicature, called the Curia Regis, which he supposes to have been of Norman and not Anglo-Saxon original, and to have exercised jurisdiction over common as well as other pleas: that the Common Pleas and Exchequer were gradually separated from the Curia Regis, and became jurisdictions wholly distinct from it; and that the separation of the Common Pleas began in the reign of Richard I. or early in the reign of King John, and was completed by Hen. III. See Mad. Hist. Exc. 63. 549: folio ed.: 3 Com. 37: 4 Inst. 99: 1 Inst. 71. b. and the note

By the 2 and 3 W. 4. c. 39. the act for uniformity of process in the superior courts, the mode of proceeding is now in the Common Pleas and in the other courts: 1. By writ of summons if the defendant is not held to bail. 2. By writ of capias if he is held to bail. 3. By writ of detainer in case of a prisoner.

The other officers of the Common Pleas are the Custos Brevium, three Prothonotaries and their Secondaries, the Clerk of the Warrants, Clerk of the Essoins, fourteen Filazers, Outlawries, and the Clerk of the Inrolment of Fines and Recoveries, Clerk of the Errors, The Custos Brevium, is the chief clerk in this court, who receives and keeps all writs returnable therein; and all records of Nisi Prius, which are delivered to him by the clerks of the assize of every circuit, &c., and and he files the rolls together, and carries them into the treasury of records: he also makes out exemplifications, and copies of all writs and records, &c. The Prothonotaries enter and enrol all declarations, pleadings, judgments, &c., and they make out all judicial writs of execution, writs of privilege, procedendos, &c. The Secondaries are assistants to the Prothonotaries in the execution of their offices: and they take minutes, and draw up all orders and rules of Court. The Filazers, who have the several counties of England divided among them, make out all mesne process, as capias, alias, pluries, &c. between the original writ and the declaration: and they make all writs of view, &c. The Exigenters appointed for several counties, make out all exigents and proclamations in order to outlawry. The Clerk of the Warrants enters all warrants of attorney, enrols deeds of bargain and sale, and estreats all issues. The Clerk of the Essoins keeps the roll of the essoins wherein he enters them, and non-suits, &c. The Clerk of the Juries makes out all writs of habeas corpora jurator', for juries to appear; and he enters the continuances till the verdict given. The Clerk of the Treasury keeps the records of the court, and makes exemplifications of records, copies of issues, judgments, &c. The Clerk of the Seals seals all writs and mesne process; also writs of outlawry and supersedeas, and all patents. The Clerk of the Outlawries makes out the writs of capias utlagatum. The Clerk of the Errors is for the allowance of writs of error, &c. The Clerk of the Involments of fines and recoveries, returns all writs of covenant, writs of entry and seisin, and enrols and exemplifies fines, &c. The Clerk of the King's silver enters the substance of the writ of covenant: and the Chirographer ingrosseth all fines, and delivers the indentures to the parties, &c.

To these officers may be added, a proclamator, a keeper of the court, cryer, and tipstaffs, besides the warden of the Fleet. There are also attornies of this court, whose number is unlimited; none may plead at the bar of the court in term time, or sign special pleadings, but serjeants at law.

COMMON PRAYER, Preces Publica.] The liturgy or prayers used in our church. It is the particular duty of clergymen, every Sunday, &c. to use the public form of prayer prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer; and if any incumbent be resident upon his living, as he ought to be, and keep a curate, four Exigenters, a clerk of the Juries, the he is obliged, by the act of uniformity, once Chirographer, Clerk of the King's Silver, the every month at least, to read the common prayers of the church, according as they are ties belong to the same. Reg. Orig. 187. But directed by the Book of Common Prayer, in little obedience would perhaps be now paid to his parish church, in his own person; or he such a writ, was any officer to dare to issue shall forfeit 5l. for every time he fails therein. it; for the Court of Exchequer seems, by pre-Stat. 13 and 14 Car. 2. c. 4. Also by that scription, to have attained a concurrent jurisstat. the Book of Common Prayer is to be provided in every parish, under the penalty of 3l. a month; and the common prayer must be read before every lecture; the whole appointed for the day, with all the circumstances and ceremonies, &c. Ministers, before all sermons, are to move the people to join in a short prayer for the Catholic church; and the whole congregation of Christian people, &c. for the king and royal family; the ministers of God's word, nobility, magistrates, and whole commons of the realm, &c.; and conclude with the Lord's Prayer, Can. 55. fusing to use the Common Prayer, or using any other open prayers, &c. is punishable by stat. 1 Eliz. c. 2. See tits. Church, Churchwarden, Parson, Service, and Sacrament.

COMMON WEAL, is understood in our law to be bonum publicum, and is a thing much favoured; and therefore the law doth tolerate many things to be done for common good which otherwise might not be done; and hence it is, that monopolies are void in law; and that bonds and covenants to restain free trade, tillage, or the like, are adjudged void. 11 Co. Rep. 50: Ployd. 35: Shep. Epit. 270.

COMMORANCY, commorantia from commoro.] An abiding, dwelling, or continuing in any place; as an inhabitant of a house in a vill, &c. Commorancy consists in usually lying in a certain place. 4 Comm. 273. See tit. Poor.

COMMORTH, or COMORTH, comortha.] From the Brit. cymmorth, i. e. subsidium, a contribution which was gathered at marriages, and when young priests said or sung the first masses, &c. See stat. 4 H. 4. c. 27. But stat. 26 H. S. c. 6. prohibits the levying any such in Wales, or the Marches, &c. Cowel.

COMMOTE, in Wales, is half a cantred or hundred, containing fifty villages. Stat. Wallie. 12 Ed. 1. Wales was anciently divided into three provinces; and each of these were again subdivided into cantreds, and every cantred into commotes. Doderige's Hist. Wal. fol. 2. Commote also signifies a great seignory or lordship, and may include one or divers manors. Co. Lit. 5.

The commoners, or COMMONANCE. tenants, and inhabitants, who had the right of common, or commoning in open field, &c. were formerly called the communance. Cowel.

COMMUNE CONCILIUM REGNI AN-GLIÆ. The common council of the king and people assembled in parliament.

COMMUNIA PLACITA NON TENEN-DA IN SCACCARIO. An ancient writ directed to the treasurer and barons of the Exchequer, forbidding them to hold plea between common persons (i. e. not debtors to the king, who alone originally sued and were sued there) in that court, where neither of the par- the civil law, made by delegates or commisdiction in civil suits with the other courts in Westminster-hall. See tits. Courts, Exchequer. And now, by the act for uniformity of process, 2 and 3 W. 4. c. 39. the Exchequer, like the other courts, can only entertain suits at common law commenced by writ of summons, where not bailable, or by writ of capias, where bailable. See Appendix to the act.

COMMUNI CUSTODIA. A writ which anciently lay for the lord, whose tenant holding by knight's service died, and left his eldest son under age, against a stranger that entered the land, and obtained the ward of the body. F. N. B. 89: Reg. Orig. 161. Since the stat. 12 Car. 2. c. 24. hath taken away wardships, this writ is become of no use.

COMMUNITY, of the kingdom. See tit.

Commonalty.

COMPANAGE, Fr.] All kind of food, except bread and drink; and Spelman interprets it to be quiquid cibi cum pane sumitur. In the manor of Feskerton, in the county of Nottingham, some tenants, when they performed their boons or work-days to the lords, had three boon loaves with companage allowed them. Reg. de Thurgarton, cited in Antiq. Nottingham.

COMPANION OF THE GARTER, is one of the knights of that most noble order; at the head of which is the king, as sovereign. See stat. 24 H. 8. c. 13. and tit. Garter.

COMPASS, an instrument used in navigation, by the direction and assistance whereof vessels are steered to the most distant parts of the world. It was invented soon after the close of the holy war, and thereby navigation was rendered more secure as well as more adventurous, the communication between remote nations was facilitated, and they were brought nearer to each other. See Roberts' Hist. Emp. C. V. v. 1. 78. See tit. Longitude.

COMPELATIVUM, an adversary or accuser. Leg. Athelstan.

COMPENSATION, for the apprehension of criminals. This, by stat. 7 G. 4. c. 64. § 28. may be allowed to persons active towards the apprehension of persons charged with murder, maliciously shooting or attempting so to do, stabbing or cutting, poisoning or administering any thing to procure miscarriage, rape, burglary, felonious housebreaking, robbery, arson, horse-stealing, bullock-stealing, sheep-stealing, or being accessary before the fact to any of these offences, or with receiving stolen property. By § 29. the order for such compensation is to be paid by the sheriff of the county; and by § 30. if any man be killed in endeavouring to apprehend any such offender, the court may order a sum to be paid to his wife, child, father, or mother, according to the circumstances of the case.

COMPERTORIUM, a judicial inquest in sioners, to find out and relate the truth of a tfine. But it is no offence to compound a mis-cause. Paroch. Antiq. 575.

COMPOSITION, compositio.] An agreement or contract between a parson, patron, and ordinary, &c. for money or other thing in lieu of tithes. Land may be exempted from the payment of tithes, where compositions have been made; and real compositions for tithes are to be made by the concurrent consent of the parson, patron, and ordinary. Real compositions are distinguished from personal contracts; for a composition called a personal contract is only an agreement between the parson and the parishioners, to pay so much instead of tithes; and though such agreement is confirmed by the ordinary, yet (if the parson is not a party) that doth not make it a real composition, because he ought to be a party to the deed of composition. Murch's Rep. 87. The compositions for tithes made by the consent of the parson, patron, and ordinary, by virtue of stat. 13 Eliz. c. 10. shall not bind the successor, unless made for twenty-one years, or three lives, as in case of leases of ecclesiastical corporations, &c. Compositions were at first for a valuable consideration, so that though, in process of time, upon the increase of the value of the lands, such compositions do not amount to the value of the tithes, yet custom prevails, and from hence arises what we call a modus decimandi. Hob. 29. See farther tit. Tithes.

The word composition hath likewise another meaning, i. e. decisio litis. Compositions were in ancient times allowed for crimes and offences, even for murder.-An expedient employed by the civil magistrate, in order to set some bounds to the violence of private revenge. This custom may be traced back to the ancient Germans. Tucit. de Morib. Ger. c. 21: Lord Kaim's Hist. Law. Tr. 1. p. 41,

COMPOSITIO MENSURARUM, is the title of an ancient ordinance for measures not printed.

COMPOUNDING FELONY, or theft-bote, is where the party robbed not only knows the felon, but also takes his goods again, or other amends upon agreement not to prosecute. 4 Bl. Com. 133. It was formerly held to make a man an accessary; but is now punished only with fine and imprisonment. P. C. c. 59. § 6: 2 Hall's Hist. 400. To take any reward for helping a person to stolen goods, without bringing the offender to justice, is made felony by 7 and 8 G. 4. c. 29. § 58. And to advertise a reward for the return of things stolen, or printing or publishing such advertisement, incurs a penalty of 50l. by § 59. of the same statute. See tits. Advertisement; and also Felony, Misprision.

COMPOUND QUI TAM ACTIONS. By 18 Eliz. c. 5. no informer shall compound, or agree with the defendant, but after answer made in court, nor after answer but by consent of the court, on pain of pillory, and disability to sue in any penal statute, and 10l. fly, but according to the nearest and most demeanor, for the party injured may maintain an action to recover compensation in damages. Cr. C. C. 9th Ed. p. 140. And compounding offences only cognizable before magistrates on summary jurisdiction is not within the statute of Eliz. 1 B. & A. 286.

COMPRINT. A surreptitious printing of another bookseller's copy, to make gain thereby, which was contrary to common law, and is now restrained by statute. See tit. Literary Property.

COMPROMISE, compromissum.] A mutual promise of two or more parties at difference, to refer the ending of their controversy to arbitrators; and West says it is the faculty or power of pronouncing sentence between persons at variance, given to arbitrators by the parties' private consent. West Symb. § 1.

Any adjustment of claims in dispute by mutual concession, without resort to the law, is a compromise. As to the effect of a compromise on the attorney's lien for costs, see

COMPTROLLER, is one who observes and examines the accounts of collectors of public money. Scotch Dict.

Comptroller of the Pipe, is an officer of the Exchequer, that writeth out summonses twice every year to the sheriffs, to levy the farms and debts of the Pipe, and also keepeth a contra-rollment of the Pipe. Scotch Dict.

COMPURGATOR. One that by oath justifics another's innocence. Compurgators were introduced as evidence in the jurisprudence of the middle ages. Their number varied according to the importance of the subject in dispute, or the nature of the crime with which a person was charged. Du Cange, voc. Juramentum, vol. 3. p. 1599. See Outh, and 3 Comm. 342: 4 Comm. 361. 407. See also tits. Clergy, Wager of Law. COMPUTATION, computatio.] account and construction of time; and to the end neither party to an agreement, &c. may do wrong to the other, nor the determination of time be left at large, it is to be taken according to the just judgment of the law. A deed dated the 20th day of August, to hold from the day of the date, shall be construed to begin on the 21st day of August; but if in the habendum it be to hold from the making, or from thenceforth, it shall begin on the day delivered. 1 Inst. 46: 5 Rep. 1. If an indenture of lease dated the 4th day of July, made for three years from thenceforth, be delivered at four of the clock in the afternoon of the said 4th day of July, the lease shall end the 3d day of July in the third year; and the law in this computation rejects all fractions or divisions of the day. See Day, Month, Year, Time, Age, &c. &c.

Computation of miles after the English manner is allowing 5280 feet, or 1760 yards to each mile; and the same shall be reckoned not by straight lines, as a bird or arrow may usual way. Cro. Eliz. 212. See Mile. Where a sum of money, without adding any thing the assignor of a public-house in London covenanted, that he would not keep a publichouse within the distance of half a mile from the premises assigned, it was held that the half-mile, as mentioned in the covenant, imported half a mile measured by the nearest way of access between the premises assigned, and any public-house afterwards kept by the assignor. Leigh v. Hind, 9 Barn. & C. 774: and see 2 Stark. Ca. 89. And as to the computation of miles under the reform act, § 27. which requires residence within seven miles. see Russell on the Act. N. B. The revising barristers under the act held different opinions as to the mode of computation, some holding it should be the straight line, as the bird flies, others by the nearest mode of ac-

COMPUTO, Lat.] A writ to compel a bailiff, receiver, or accountant, to yield up his accounts: it is founded on the statute of Westm. 2. cap. 12. And also lies against guardians, &c. Reg. Orig. 135. There is also a rate to compute principal and interest granted in actions on bills and notes, which refers it to the master to compute the principal and interest due in case judgment by default, and thereby saves, the expence of a writ of inquiry before a sheriff's jury.

CONCEALERS, concelators, so called à concelando, as mons à movendo, by an antiphrasis.] Such as were used to find out concealed lands, i. e. such lands as are privily kept from the king by common persons, having nothing to show for their title or estate therein. See stat. 39 Eliz. c. 23. There are concealers of crime; and as to concealing treason, &c. see tit. Misprision.

CONCESSI, I have granted. A word of frequent use in conveyances, creating a covenant in law, as dedi (I have given,) makes a warranty. Co. Lit. 384. This word is of a general extent, and said to amount to a grant, feoffment, lease and release, &c. 2 Saund. 96. CONCESSIT SOLVERE. This is an action of debt upon simple contract, and lies by custom in the courts of the cities of London and Bristol, and the great sessions in Wales. Sti. 198. Paschall v. Sparing. The courts of great session in Wales are abolished by 1 W. 4. c. 70. § 13. The present form of declaring in this action in London is, that the defendant, in consideration of divers sums of money before that time due and owing from the said defendant to the said plaintiff, and then in arrear and unpaid, granted and agreed to pay (concessit solvere) to the said plaintiff 1001. where and when the same should afterwards be demanded, yet, &c. And this general form has been held good upon a writ of error. 1 Rol. Abr. 564. pl. 21: 2 Lord Raym. 1. 32. Story v. Atkins. In the court of great sessions in Wales, the form of declaring in this action is still more general; for there it is sufficient merely to state that the defendant, on, more. But to prevent a surprise upon the defendant from this very general way of declaring, it is necessary for the plaintiff to give notice in writing of the particular cause of action. It is observable, however, that in a case, 39 H. 6. 29. abridged Bro. London, 15. it is said that it was agreed for law, that in debt in London upon a concessit solvere by the custom, the declaration shall be, that for merchandizes to him before sold he granted to pay 101., so that the merchandize must be mentioned in this action of debt, or the defendant may wage his law. Bro. Ley, Gager, 69. It does not lie against executors or administrators, because as they are presumed to be ignorant of the contract made by their testator or intestate, they cannot wage their law. 9 Rep. 87. b. Pinchon's case, Sti. 199: Hodges v. Jane, ibid. 228: Oreswich v. Amery. However, if the action be brought against an executor or administrator, he must demur; for it cannot be taken advantage of in arrest of judgment, or upon error. Plowd. 182. Norwood v. Read: Vaugh. 97. 100. and the authorities there cited: by the custom of London, indeed, a defendant cannot wage his law in this action; 1 Wils. 277. Gunn v. Mackherry; and therefore it lies there against an executor or administrator, upon a contract made with the deceased. 8 Rep. 126. a. The city of London's case, 5 Rep. 82. b.: Snelling's case, Cro. CONCLUSION, conclusio.] Is when a man by his own act upon record hath charged himself with a duty or other thing, or confessed any matter whereby he shall be concluded: as if a sheriff returns that he hath taken the body upon capias, and hath not the body in court at the day of the return of the writ; by this return the sheriff is concluded from plea of escape, &c. Terms de la Ley. In another sense, this word conclusion signifies the end of any plea, replication, &c., and a plea to the writ is to conclude to the writ; a plea in bar, to conclude to the action, &c. See tit. Pleading.—And as to the conclusion of Deeds, see tit. Deeds.

CONCORD, concordia.] Is an agreement made between two or more upon a trespass committed, and is divided into concord executory and concord executed. Ploud. 5, 6.8. These concords and agreements are by way of satisfaction for the trespass, &c. See tits.

Accord, Satisfaction.

Concord is also an agreement between parties, who intend the levying of a fine of lands one to the other, how and in what manner the lands shall pass: it is the foundation and substance of the fine taken and acknowledged &c. at, &c. granted to pay to the plaintiff such by the party before one of the judges of C. B., or by commissioners in the country. See, to be paid at such a feast, upon condition if tit. Fine.

CONCUBARIA, a fold, pen, or place where cattle lie. Cowel.

CONCUBEANT, lying together. Stat. 1 H. 7. c. 6.

CONCUBINAGE, concubinatus.] In common acceptation, the keeping of a harlot or concubine; but in a legal sense, it is used as an exception against her that sueth for dower, alleging thereby that she was not a wife lawfully married to the party in whose land she seeks to be endowed, but his concubine. Brit. c. 107: Bract. lib. 4. tract. 6. c. 8. There was a concubinage allowed in Scripture to the patriarchs, secundum legem matrimonii, Blount.

CONDERS, from the Fr. conduire, to conduct. Such as stand upon high places near the sea-coast, at the time of herring-fishing, to make signs with boughs, &c. to the fishermen at sea, which way the shoals of herrings pass; for this may be better discovered by such as stand upon some high cliff on the shore, by reason of a kind of blue colour which the herrings casue in the water, than by those that are in the ships or boats for fishing. These are otherwise called huers and balkers, directors and guiders. See stat. 1 Jac. 1. c. 23.

CONDITION .- Conditio.] A restraint annexed to a thing, so that by the non-performance, the party to it 'shall receive prejudice and loss; and by the performance, commodity and advantage. Or it is a restriction of men's acts, qualifying or suspending the same, and making them uncertain whether they shall take effect or not. Also it is defined to be what is referred to an uncertain chance, which may happen or not happen. West's Symb. part 1. lib. 2. § 156.

A condition is also defined to be a kind of law or bridle, annexed to one's act, staying or suspending the same, and making it uncertain whether it shall take effect or no; or it is a modus, a quality, annexed by him that hath estate, interest, or right to the land, &c. whereby an estate, &c. may either be created, defeated, or enlarged, upon an uncertain event. This differs from a limitation, which is the bounds or compass of an estate, or the time how long an estate shall continue. Shep. Touchst. 117. See tit. Limitation.

A condition may be also considered as one of the terms upon which a grant may be made: in this sense a condition in a deed is a clause of contingency, on the happening of which the estate granted may be defeated. 2 Comm. 299.

Of conditions there are divers kinds. viz. conditions in deed, or express; and in law, or implied; conditions precedent, and subsequent; conditions inherent, and collateral, &c.

A condition in a deed, or express, is that which is joined by express words to a feoffment, lease, or other grant; as if a man makes the lessee fail in payment at the day, then it shall be lawful for the lessor to enter. Condition in law, or implied, is when a person grants another an office, as that of keeper of a park, steward, bailiff, &c., for term of life: here, though there be no condition expressed in the grant, yet the law makes one, which is, if the grantee do not justly execute all things belonging to the office, it shall be lawful for the grantor to enter and discharge him of his office. Lit. lib. 3. c. 5.

Condition precedent is when a lease or estate is granted to one for life, upon condition that if the lessee pay to the lessor a certain sum at such a day, then he shall have fee simple; in this case the condition precedes the estate in fee, and on performance thereof gains the fee simple. Condition subsequent is when a man grants to another his manor of Dale, &c. in fee, upon condition that the grantee shall pay to him at such a day such a certain sum, or that his estate shall cease: here the condition is subsequent, and following the estate, and upon the performance thereof continues and preserves the same; so that a condition precedent doth get and gain the thing or estate made upon condition by the performance of it; as a condition subsequent keeps and continues the estate by the performance of the condition 1 Inst.201.327: Terms de la Ley. If one agree with another to do such an act, and for the doing thereof the other shall pay so much money; here the doing the act is a condition precedent to the payment of the money, and the party shall not be compelled to pay till the act is done: but where a day is appointed for the payment of money, which day happens before the thing contracted for can be performed, there the money may be recovered before the thing is done; for here it appears that the party did not intend to make the performance of the thing a condition precedent. 3 Salk. 95. See post, I. IV.

Inherent conditions are such as descend to the heir with the land granted, &c.

A collateral condition is that which is annexed to any collateral act.

Conditions are likewise affirmative, which consist of doing; negative, which consist of not doing: some are farther said to be restrictive, for not doing a thing; and some compulsory, as that the lessee shall pay the rent,

Also some conditions are single, to do one thing only; some copulative, to do divers things; and others disjunctive, where one thing of several is required to be done. Lit. 201. See farther Shep. Touch. 117. &c.

As to certain estates on condition expressed or implied, see more particularly tits. Mortgage, Statute-Merchant, Elegit.

Among these several kinds of conditions, the cases which most frequently occur fall under the distinctions of conditions precedent a lease of lands to another, reserving a rent and subsequent. We shall, therefore, speak of them more at large under the following, Co. Lit. 215. So if any tenants for years, for divisions; wherein shall be considered, in the first place, generally,

I. 1. Of Estates on Conditions implied; and 2. On conditions expressed .-Then more particularly,

II. To what Conditions may be annexed: what Conditions are good; and by what Words they may be created.

III. What shall be a good Performance of a Condition; and in what Manner the Breach of it must be taken Advantage of.

IV. Of Conditions precedent and subsequent.

I. 1. Of Estates on Conditions implied.— Estates upon condition implied in law are where a grant of an estate has a condition annexed to it inseparably, from its essence and constitution; although no condition be expressed in words. As if a grant be made to a man of an office generally, without adding other words; the law tacitly annexes hereto a secret condition, that the grantee shall duly execute his office, Lit. § 378.); on breach of which condition it is lawful for the grantor, or his heirs, to oust him, and grant to another person. Lit. § 379. For an office, either public or private, may be forfeited by misuser, or non-user, both of which are breaches of this implied condition. By mis-user or abuse; as if a judge takes a bribe, or a parkkeeper kills deer without authority. By nonuser, or neglect; which in public offices, that concern the administration of justice, or the commonwealth, is of itself a direct and immediate cause of forfeiture; but non-user of a private office is no cause of forfeiture; unless some special damage is proved to be occasioned thereby. Co. Lit. 233. For in the one case delay must necessarily be occasioned in the affairs of the public, which require a constant attention; but, private offices not requiring so regular and unremitted a service, the temporary neglect of them is not necessarily productive of mischief, upon which account some special loss must be proved, in order to vacate these. Franchises also, being regal privileges in the hands of a subject, are held to be granted on the same condition of making a proper use of them, and therefore they may be lost and forfeited, like offices, either by abuse or by neglect. 9 Rep.

Upon the same principle proceed all the forfeitures which are given by law of lifeestates and others, for any acts done by the tenant himself, that are incompatible with the estate which he holds. As if tenant for life or years enfeoff a stranger in fee simple: this is, by the common law, a forfeiture of their several estates; being a breach of the condition which the law annexes thereto, viz. that they shall not attempt to create a greater Littleton, § 380. 1 Inst. 234. denominates estate than they themselves are entitled to.

life, or in fee, commit a felony, the king or other lord of the fee is entitled to have their tenements, because their estate is determined by the breach of the condition, "that they shall not commit felony," which the law tacitly annexes to every feudal donation.

2. On Conditions expressed.—An estate on condition expressed in the grant itself, is where an estate is granted either in fee simple or otherwise, with an express qualification annexed, whereby the estate granted shall either commence, be enlarged, or be defeated, upon performance or breach of such qualification or condition. Co. Lit. 201.

These conditions are, therefore, either precedent or subsequent. Precedent are such as must happen or be performed before the estate can vest or be enlarged; subsequent are such, by the failure or non-performance of which an estate already vested may be defeated. Thus, if an estate for life be limited to A. upon his marriage with B., the marriage is a precedent condition, and till that happens no estate is vested in A. Show. P. C. 83. &c. Or if a man grant to his lessee for years, that upon payment of an hundred marks within the term he shall have the fee, this also is a condition precedent, and the fee simple passeth not till the hundred marks be paid. Co. Lit. 217. But if a man grant an estate in fee simple, reserving to himself and his heirs a certain rent, and that, if such rent be not paid at the times limited, it shall be lawful for him or his heirs to re-enter, and avoid the estate: in this case the grantce and his heirs have an estate upon condition subsequent, which is defeasible, if the condition be not strictly performed. Lit. § 225. See post, IV.

To this class may also be referred all base fees and fee simples conditional at the common law. Thus an estate to a man and his heirs, tenants of the manor of Dale, is an estate on condition that he and his heirs continue tenants of that manor. And so, if a personal annuity be granted at this day to a man and the heirs of his body; as this is no tenement within the stat. of Westm. 2. it remains, as at common law, a fee simple, on condition that the grantee has heirs of his body. Upon the same principle depend all determinable estates of freehold, as durante viduitate, &c. These are estates upon condition that the grantee do not marry, and the like: and on the breach of any of these subsequent conditions, by the failure of the contingencies, by the grantee not continuing tenant of the manor of Dale, by not having heirs of his body, or by not continuing sole, the estates which were respectively vested in each grantee are wholly determined and words of its creation, that it cannot endure for any longer time than till the contingency happens upon which the estate is to fail, this is denominated a limitation: as when land is time certain, and may determine sooner (as a granted to a man so long as he is parson of Dale, or while he continues unmarried, or until out of the rents and profits he have made 500l., and the like; in such case the estate determines as soon as the contingency happens (when he ceases to be parson, marries a wife, or has received the 500l.); and the next subsequent estate, which depends upon such determination, becomes immediately vested, without any act to be done by him who is next in expectancy. See 10 Rep. 41. But when an estate is, strictly speaking, upon condition in deed (as if granted expressly upon condition to be void upon the payment of 40l. by the grantor, or so that the grantee continues unmarried, or provided he goes to York, &c.), the law permits it to endure beyoud the time when such contingency happens, unless the grantor or his heirs or assigns, take advantage of the breach of the condition, and make either an entry or a claim, in order to avoid the estate. Lit. § 347: Stat. 3 H. 8. c. 34. See 10 Rep. 42. Yet though strict words of condition be used in the creation of the estate, if on breach of the condition the estate be limited over to a third person, and does not immediately revert to the grantor or his representatives (as if an estate be granted by A. to B., on the condition that within two years B. intermarry with C., and on failure thereof then to D. and his heirs); this law construes to be a limitation, and not a condition; 1 Vent. 202; because if it were a condition, then, upon the breach thereof, only A. or his representatives could avoid the estate by entry, and so D.'s remainder might be defeated by their neglecting to enter; but when it is a limitation the estate of B. determines, and that of D. commences, and he may enter on the lands the instant the failure happens. So also, if a man by his will devises lands to his heir at law, on condition that he pays a sum of money, and, for non-payment, devises it over, this shall be considered as a limitation; otherwise no ad-vantage could be taken of the non-payment, for none but the heir himself could have entered for a breach of condition. Cro. Eliz. 205: 1 Rol. Abr. 411.

In all these instances of limitations or conditions subsequent it is to be observed, that so long as the condition, either expressed or implied, either in deed or in law, remains unbroken, the grantee may have an estate of freehold; provided the estate upon which such condition is annexed be in itself of a freehold nature; as if the original grant express either an estate of inheritance or for life, or no estate at all, which is constructively an estate for life. For the breach of these conditions being contingent and uncertain, this uncertainty preserves the freehold; Co. Lit. 42: because the estate is capable to last for is so expressly confined and limited by the ever, or at least for the life of the tenant, supposing the condition to remain unbroken. But where the estate is, at the utmost, a chattel interest, which must determine at a grant for ninety-nine years, provided A. B. and C., or the survivor of them, shall so long live, this still continues a mere chattel, and is not, by such its uncertainty, ranked among estates of freehold.

These express conditions, if they be impossible at the time of their creation, or afterwards become impossible by the act of God, or the act of the feoffer himself, or if they be contrary to law, or repugnant to the nature of the estate, are void. In any of which cases, if they be conditions subsequent, that is, to to be performed after the estate is vested, the estate shall become absolute in the tenant. As if a feoffment be made to a man in fee simple, on condition, that unless he goes to Rome in twenty-four hours; or unless he marries with A. B. by such a day (within which time the woman dies, or the fcoffer marries her himself); or unless he kills another; or in case he aliens in fee; that then and in any of such cases the estate shall be vacated and determined: here the condition is void, and the estate made absolute in the feoffee; for he hath, by the grant, the estate vested in him, which shall not be defeated afterwards, by a condition either impossible, illegal, or repugnant. Co. Lit. 206. But if the condition be precedent, or to be performed before the estate vests, as a grant to a man that, if he kills another, or goes to Rome in a day, he shall have an estate in fee; here the void condition being precedent, the estate which depends thereon is also void, and the grantee shall take nothing by the grant, for he hath no estate until the condition be performed. Ibid. 2 Comm. 152-157.

II. To what Conditions may be annexed; what Conditions are good; and by what Words they may be created. Conditions may be annexed to any estate, whether in fee simple, fee tail for life, or years; they run with the estate, and bind in the hands of whomsoever they come. Lit. Rep. 128. But a condition may not be made but on the part of the lessor, donor, &c.; for no man may annex a condition to an estate, but he that doth create the estate itself. Conditions are good to enlarge or limit estates. There are four incidents, which conditions to create and increase an estate ought to have. 1. They should have a particular estate, as a foundation whereupon the increase of the greater estate shall be built. 2. Such particular estate shall continue in the lessee or grantee until the increase happens. 3. It must vest at the time the contingency happens, or it shall never vest. 4. The particular estate and increase must take effect by the same deed, or by several deeds delivered at the same time. 8 Rep. 75.

Conditions to create estates shall be favourably construed; but conditions which tend to shall have the fee. 8 Rep. 73. But if a man destroy, or restrain an estate, are to be taken strictly. A feoffment upon condition that the feoffee shall not alien is void; but a condition in a feoffment not to alien for a particular time, or to a particular person, may be good. Hob. 13. 261. And if a condition is, that tenant in tail shall not alien in fee, &c., or tenant for life or years not alien during the term, these conditions are good. Where the reversion of an estate is in the donor, he may restrain an alienation by condition. 10 Rep. 39: 1 Inst. 222. If one make a gift in tail, on condition that the donee or his heirs shall not alien, this is good to some intents, and void to others; for if he make a fcoffment in fee, or any other estate by which the reversion is discontinued tortiously, the donor may enter; but it is otherwise if he suffer a common recovery. 1 Inst. 223.

A liberty inseparable from an estate cannot be restrained; and therefore a condition that a tenant in tail shall not levy a fine within the stat. 4 H. 7. c. 24. or suffer a recovery; or not make a lease within the stat. 32 H. 8. c. 36. is void and repugnant. But if the condition restrain levying a fine at common law, it may be good. 2 Danv. Abr. 22. A gift in tail, or in fee, upon condition that a feme shall not be endowed; or baron be tenant by the courtesy, is repugnant and void. So is a condition in a lease, &c. that the lessee shall not take the profits; and where a man grants a rent charge out of land, provided it shall not charge the lands. Co. Lit. 146.

Conditions repugnant to the estate, impossible, &c. are void; and if they go before the estate, the estate and condition are void; if to follow it, the estate is absolute, and the condition void. 1 Inst. 206: 9 Rep. 128. if at the time of entering into a condition, a thing be possible to be done, and become afterwards impossible by the act of God, the estate of a feoffee (created by livery) shall not be avoided. 2 Mod. 204. See ante, I. 2.

Where a condition is of two parts, one possible, and the other not so, it is a good condition for performing that part which is possible. Cro. Eliz. 780. Though if a condition is of two parts disjunctive, and one part becomes impossible, by the act of God, the person bound is not obliged to perform the other. 1 Rol. Abr. 446. l. 45: 2 Mod. 202, 203. If a condition be in the copulative, and is not possible to be performed, it is said it may be taken in the disjunctive. 1 Danv. Abr. 73.

Where an estate is to be wholly created upon a condition impossible to be performed, there the estate shall never come in esse. 1 Leon. c. 311. A woman makes a feoffment to a man that is married, upon condition that he shall marry her; this condition is not impossible, for the man's wife may die, and then he may marry her. 2 Danv. 25. A reversion may be granted in tail upon condition, that if the grantee pays so much, he tions against law are void; but what may be grants lands, &c. for years, upon condition that, if the lessee pay 20s. within one year, he shall have it for life; and that if he after the year pay 20s. he shall have the fee; though both sums are paid, he shall have but an estate for life: the estate for life; at the time of the grant, being only in contingency, and a possibility cannot increase upon a possibility, nor can the fee increase upon the estate for years. 8 Rep. 75.

If a lease be made to two, with condition to raise a fee, and one dies, the survivor may perform the condition, and have the fee; but if they make partition, the condition is destroyed. 8 Rep. 75, 76. If a fcoffee grant the reversion of part of the land, on a lease for years, on which a rent upon condition is reserved, all the condition is confounded and gone; though if the lessee assign part, the condition remains, for he cannot discharge the estate of the condition. 2 Danv. Abr. 119. A man makes a feoffment upon condition, and after levies a fine to a stranger; the condition is gone. Ibid. 120. If a feoffee, upon condition to infcoff another, infcoff a stranger; or if it be to re-infeoff the feoffor, and he grant the land to another person, upon condition to perform the condition, the condition is broken, because the feoffee hath disabled himself to do it; so where such feoffee, upon condition to re-infeoff, &c., takes a wife, that the land is subject to the dower of the wife; and so if the land is recovered, and execution sued out by another, the condition is broken. Co. Lit. 221: 1 Danv. 79.

If one disseise the feoffee, or any other who hath land by just title, and thereof in-feoff a stranger on condition, and the land is lawfully recovered from him that hath the title; by this the condition is destroyed; and if a disseisor make a feoffment in fee upon condition, and after the disseisee doth enter upon the feoffee, this doth extinguish the condition. Perk. § 821. If the feoffee makes a feoffment of all or part of the land to the feoffor before the condition is broken, the condition is gone for ever; and if he make a lease for life or years only, then the condition will be suspended for that time. Co. Lit. 218. But it is otherwise where the feoffment or lease for life or years are made to any other but the feoffor. Ibid. Where the con-dition of a feoffment is, that if the feoffor or his heir pay a certain sum of money to the feoffce such a day, and before that day the feoffor dieth without heir; or if the feoffment be made by a woman on condition to pay her 101,, or that the feoffee infeoff her by a certain day, and they intermarry before the day, and the marriage doth continue till after it; in these cases the condition is gone. Perk. § 763, 764.

A condition that would take away the whole effect of a grant is void; and so it is if it be prohibited by law may be prohibited by deed. tion, as where a lease is made for years, if 1 Inst. 206. 220. He that taketh an estate in remainder is bound by condition in a deed, though he doth not seal it.

Conditions in restraint of marriage have not generally been favoured, as contrary to sound policy; but where a legacy has been given over to another, there the condition has always been held good; and it seems that such conditions as only reasonably restrain children from imprudent marriages will be always supported; that is to say, where they operate only as particular, not as universal, restrictions. In the case of Scott v. Tyler, 2 Bro. C. R. 431. &c. it was determined, after very long arguments, that a condition annexed to a legacy, that the legatee should not marry under twenty.one, without consent of her mother (or rather that the legacy should vest previous to twenty-one, if the legatee married with such consent), was a valid condition.-And upon marriage without such consent, it was determined to go to the mother under a gift of general residue.-See the first paragraph of Div. III. of this title.-And the cases of Peyton v. Bury, 2 P. Wms. 626. and the following cases cited in Mr. Cox's and the following cases cited in Mr. Cox's note there, viz. Bellases v. Ermine, 1 C. R. 303.—But where a legacy is given on consideration that the legatee should not marry without consent, and there is no devise over, the condition is void. See 4 Burr. 2055: Com. Rep. 739. and the cases there cited. The case of Scott v. Tyler, above mentioned, and Amos v. Horner, 1 Eq. Ab. 112. p. 9. have determined that a bequest of the residue, notwithstanding some contradictory authorities, is equivalent to a limitation over, where the condition is precedent and never performed. As to the invalidity of a legacy in perfect restraint of matriage, see Knap v. Noyes, Ambl. 662. and Elton v. Elton, 1 Wils. 159. And the rule of the ecclesiastical law is, that where a portion is given in consideration that a daughter should never marry, the condition is void. Swimb.—See also Rose's notes on Com. Rep. 728. and the cases there cited; and at large on this subject, Fon-blanque's Treatise of Equity, i. 245, &c. and this Dict. tit. Marriage.

The word "if" will not always make a

A. B. lives so long. And this is contrary to a condition; for a stranger may take advantage of an estate determined thereby, &c. Co. Lit. 236: Dyer, 300. Sub conditione is the most proper word to make a condition: proviso is as good a word, when not dependent upon another sentence; but in some cases, the word proviso may make no condition, but be only a qualification or explanation of a covenant. 2 Danv. 1, 2. And neither the word proviso, nor any other, makes a condition, unless it is restrictive. Plowd. 34: 1 Nels. 466.

Regularly the word "for" does not import a condition, though it has the force of a condition when the thing granted is executory. and the consideration of the grant is a service, or some such thing, for which there is no remedy other than the stopping the thing granted; as in the case of an annuity granted pro consilio, or for executing the office of a steward of a court or the service of a captain or keeper of a fort: here the failure of giving counsel, or performing the service, is a kind of eviction of that which is to be done for the annuity, the grantor having no means either to exact the counsel, or recompence for it, but by stopping the annuity; and in these cases the condition is not precedent, and therefore the performance thereof need not be averred when the annuity is demanded. Per Hobart, C. J. Hob. 41. Mich. 10 Jac. in the case of Cowper v. Andrews.

As the intent of the testator chiefly governs in wills, such construction is always made of the words as will best support his intent, and therefore these words, ad faciendum, faciendo, ea intentione, ad effectum, &c. in a will create a condition. Co. Lit. 204. a. See tits. Devise, Will.

A grant to one to the intent he shall do so and so, is no condition, but a trust and confidence. Dyer, 138. Some words in a lease do not make a condition, but a covenant, upon which the lessor may bring his action. A lease being the deed of lessor and lessee, every word is spoken by both; and a condition may be therein, though it sounds in covenant. 1 Nels. 464. A covenant not to grant, sell, &c. may be a condition; and covenant that, paying the rent, the lessee shall enjoy the land, is conditional. 2 Danv. 2. 6. Where words are indefinite, and proper to defeat an estate, they shall be taken to have the force of a condition. Palm. 503. By a memorandum of agreement in consideration of the rents and conditions thereinafter contained, A. was to have, hold, and occupy as on lease, certain premises therein specified, at a certain rent per acre; and it was stipulated that no buildings should be included or leased by the agreement; and it was farther agreed and stipulated that A. should take at the rent aforesaid certain other parcels as the same might fall in; and, lastly, it was stipulated and condicondition; but sometimes it makes a limita- tioned that A. should not assign, transfer, or underlet any part of the premises; it was | breach of the condition without any entry. held that by the last clause a condition was created, for breach of which the lessor might enter. Doe, d. Henniker, v. Wall, 8 Barn. & C. 308: and see 2 Bing. 13.

What shall be a good Performance of a Condition; and in what Manner the Breach of it must be taken Advantage of.— A condition may be well performed, when it is done as near to the intent as may be: for if the condition of a feoffment be that the feoffee shall make an estate back to the feoffor and his wife, and the heirs of their two bodies, remainder to the right heirs of the feoffor; in this case, if the feoffor die before, the estate shall be made to the wife without impeachment of waste, the remainder to the heirs of the body of the husband begotten on the wife, &c. Co. Lit. 219: 8 Rep. 69. If a condition be performed in substance and effect, it is good, although it differs in words; and where it is to deliver letters patent, and the party bound having lost them, delivers an exemplification, &c. 2 Danv. 40. Though payment of the money before the day is payment at the day, in performance of a condition; yet a feoffor, &c. cannot re-enter, and revest his old estate by force of the condition, till the day whereon the condition gives him power to re-enter. Ibid. 121. If a man seised of land in right of his wife make a feoffment in fee on condition, and dies; if the heir of the feoffor enters for the condition broken, and defeats the feoffment, his estate vanishes, and presently it is vested in the wife. Co. Lit. 202. And if a person seised of land, as heir on the part of his mother, makes a feoffment on condition and dieth; though the heir on the part of the father, who is heir at common law, may enter for the condition broken, the heir on the part of the mother shall enter upon him, and enjoy the land. 1bid. 12.

Where there is a condition in a feoffment or lease, that if no distress can be found, the feoffor, &c. shall re-enter; if the place is not open to the distress, as if there be only a cupboard in the house, which is locked, &c. it is all one as if there was no distress there, and the feoffor, &c. may enter. 2 Danv. 46. When a rent is to be paid upon condition at a certain day, the lessor cannot enter for the condition broken, before demand of the rent. Ibid. 98. And the lessor ought to demand the rent at the day, or the condition shall not be broken by the non-payment of the rent. A re-entry, may be given on a feoffment, &c. though none be reserved: if one make a lease for life or feoffment upon condition, that if the feoffee or lessee does such an act, the estate shall be void: now although the estate cannot be void before entry, this is a good condition, and shall give an entry to the less-or, &c. by implication. 1 Rol. Abr. 408. A lease for life on condition, being a freehold, to infants and feme coverts, upon condition, cannot cease without entry; but if it be a shall bind them, because the charge is on the 1 Inst. 214. If a lease for years is, that, on breach of the condition, the term shall cease, the term is ended without entry; but where the words are, that the lease shall be void, it is otherwise. Cro. Car. 511: 3 Rep. 64. Regularly, where one will take advantage of a condition, if he may enter, he must do it; and if he cannot enter, he must make a claim. Co. Lit. 218. Where on condition broken, lessor brings an ejectment, entry is not necessary: if tenant defends, he is bound by the rule to confess entry.

No one can reserve the power or benefit of re-entry, on breach of a condition to any other but himself, his heirs, executors, &c., parties and privies, in right and representation: privies in law, grantees of reversions, &c. are to have no advantage by it. But by the stat. 32 H. 8. c. 28. grantees of reversions may take advantage against lessees, &c. by action. 1 Inst. 214, 215: Plowd. 175. Where one doth enter for a condition broken, it generally makes the eatate void ab initio, and the party comes in of his first estate; and he shall have the land in the same manner it was when he parted with it; and his possession at the time of making the condition; therefore he shall avoid all subsequent charges on the lands. 4 Rep. 120: Plowd. 186: Co. Lit. 233. If one enters on a condition performed, he shall avoid all incumbrances upon the land after the condition made: and a condition when broken, or performed, &c. will defeat the whole estate. So that if there be a lease for life, remainder in fee on condition that the lessee for life shall pay 201. to the lessor; if he pay not this money, the estate in remainder will be avoided also. Dyer, 127: 8 Rep. 90. But this may be otherwise by special limitation to an use: and if tenant for life and he in remainder join in a feoffment on condition, that if, &c. then the tenant for life shall re-enter; this may be good without defeating the whole estate; though regularly a condition may not avoid part of an estate, and leave another part entire, nor can the estate be void as to some persons, and good as to others. 8 Rep. 190: 1 Inst. 214.

Lessee for life makes a feoffment on condition, and enters for the condition broken; by this he shall be restored to his estate for life, and reduce the reversion to the lessor; and the rent due to the lessor shall be revived: but in this case the lessee will not be in the same course as he was before; for his estate is subject to a forfeiture, though he be tenant for life still. Roll. 474: Shep. Abr. 405.

Tenants by the curtesy tenant in tail after posibility of issue extinct, tenants in dower, for life, or years, &c. hold their estates subject to a condition in law, not to grant a grealease for years, the lease is void ipso facto, on land. 2 Danv. 30. A release of all a man's right may be upon condition; a lessee may | v. Brownell, Finch. 178: Pitcairne v. Bruce, surrender upon condition: a contract may be upon condition, &c. But a parson cannot resign upon condition, any more than be admitted upon condition: and a condition cannot be released on condition. 9 Rep. 85.

No person shall defeat any estate of freehold upon condition without showing the deed wherein the condition is contained, but of chattels real or personal, &c., a man may plead that such grants or leases were made upon condition without showing the deeds; and in the case of a condition to avoid a freehold, though it may not be pleaded without the deed, it may be given in evidence to a jury, and they may find the matter at large. Lit. 374: 5 Rep. 40. A condition may be apportioned by act of law, or of the lessee. 4 Rep. 120. But a man cannot by his own act divide, or apportion a condition, which goes to the destruction of an estate. 1 Nels. Abr. 474. condition in a will is a thing odious in law, which shall not be created without sufficient words. 2 Leon. 40. A devise to the heir at law, provided he pay to A. B. 201., is a void condition, because there is no person to take advantage of the non-performance. 1 Lutw. 797. Yet conditional devises, as well of lands as of goods, are allowed by our law, and not being performed, the heir or executors shall take advantage of them. 1 Nels. 467.

Where there are negative and affirmative conditions, the pleader must show, not only that he has not broken the negative ones, but also that he has performed the affirmative ones. Fletcher v. Richardson, Hardw. 322.

As to relief against the breach of conditions, some say that in all cases of penalty or forfeiture that lie in compensation, equity will relieve; for where they can make compensation, no harm is done. So that although an express time be appointed for the performance of a condition, the judge may, after that day is past, allow a reasonble space to the party, making reparation for the damage, if it be not very great, nor the substance of the covenant destroyed by it. See Fonblanque's Treat. Eq. i. 387, and the cases there cited.

The substantial distinction which governs the interference of courts of equity in cases of conditions broken, is not whether the condition be precedent or subsequent, but whether compensation can or cannot be made: and therefore, where A. conveyed lands to B. &c. upon trust, that if C., the son of A., within six months after the death of A., should secure to trustees 500l. for the younger children of C., then after such security given to convey to C. and his heirs; and until the time for giving such security in trust for the eldest son of C., and in default of such security, to convey to such eldest son and his heirs; C. died before such security given; yet this condition precedent being only in the nature of a penalty, the intent of the trust shall be regarded, which

But though equity will, under some circumstances, relieve against the breach of a condition precedent, where damages are certain; yet it seems, that they will not where the damages accrued are contingent, and cannot be estimated. Sweet v. Anderson, 5 Vin. 93. pl. 15. See Treatise of Equity, p. 209. 387. 391.

IV. Of Conditions precedent and subsequent.—There are no precise technical words required in a deed, to make a stipulation a condition precedent or subsequent; neither does it depend on the circumstance whether the clause is placed prior or posterior in the deed, so that it operates as a proviso or covenant; for the same words have been construed to operate as either the one or the other according to the nature of the transaction. Ashhurst, J., 1 Term Rep. 645 .- Farther as to the nature of conditions precedent and subsequent, see 3 Atk. 364: 2 P. Wms. 419. 626: 1 Vern. 83: 3 C. C. 130: 3 Lev. 132: Fearne on Cont. Rem.: 2 Burr. 899: 4 Burr. 1930: 1 Wils. 105. 136: 2 Bro. C. R. 67. and Ib. 431. 489: Bac. Ab. tit. Pleas and Pleading. B. 5. 1 (7th ed.): and 1 Wils. Saunders, 320. b. c. d. A condition annexed to a legacy, that the legatee should marry with consent of her mother, was held to be valid. In 1 Eq. Ab. 108. it is said that conditions precedent are such as are annexed to estates, and must be punctually performed before the estate can A condition subsequent is when the estate is executed; but the continuance of such estate depends on the breach or performance of the condition. The two most material points of discussion respecting the doctrine and different operations at law, and in equity, of conditions precedent and subsequent arise, 1. From cases where conditions are annexed to devises making them void on the marriage of the devisee without consent. See ante, II.and tit. Marriage: and 2. From cases arising on the vesting of portions and legacies made payable at a future time. See tits. Devise. Legacy, Portions.

Conditions precedent are such as must be punctually performed before the estate can vest; but on a condition subsequent, the estate is immediately executed: yet the continuance of such estate dependeth on the breach or performance of the condition. Co. Lit. 218: Eq. Ab. 108: 14 East, 601. As if I grant, that if A. will go to such a place, about my business, he shall have such an estate, or that he shall have 101., &c., this is a condition precedent. 1 Rol. Abr. 414. So if I retain a man for 40s. to go with me to Rome, this is a condition precedent, for the duty commences by going to Rome. 1 Rol. Abr. 914. So if a man by was to secure 500l. to the younger children. will devises certain legacies, and then devises Wallis v. Crimes, 1 C. C. 89. See Glascock all the residue of his estate to his executor, after debts, legacies, &c. paid and discharged, | Mutford, and Lothingland Hundred, 3 East, this is a condition precedent; so that the executor cannot have the residue of the estate before the debts and legacies are discharged. 1 Rol. Abr. 415: 1 Jones, 327: Cro. Car. 335.

But if a man devises a term to A., and if his wife suffers the devisee to enjoy it for three vears, that she shall have all his goods as executrix; but if she disturbs A., then he makes B. executor, and dies, his wife is executrix presently; for though in grants the estate shall not vest till the condition precedent is performed, yet it is otherwise in a will, which must be guided by the intent of the parties; and this shall not be construed as a condition precedent, but only as a condition to abridge the power of being executrix, if she performed it not. Cro. Eliz. 219.

Where a testator devised his estate to trustees to pay the rents to his son while unmarried, and in case of his marriage with consent of the trustees to convey to him, but in case of his marriage against their consent, then to sell the estate and divide the proceeds amongst other persons, and the son married without the knowledge of the trustees, and both of them disapproved when they knew it, the devise over was held to take effect, since the marriage with consent was a condition precedent. Long v.

Where the one promise is the consideration of the other, and where the performance and not the promise is, must be gathered from the words and nature of the agreement, and depends entirely thereupon; for, if there was a positive promise that one should release his equity of redemption, and on the other side, that the other would pay 71, then the one might bring his action without any averment of performance; but where the agreement is, that the plaintiff should release his equity of redemption, in consideration whereof the defendent was to pay him 7l., so that the release is the consideration, and therefore being executory, it is a condition precedent, which must be averred. 12 Mod. 455. 460. Thorp v. Thorp.

So in an action against the hundred for damage sustained by the wilful burning of the party's barn, it was considered to be a precedent condition that the party grieved should, within the time limited, give in his examination upon oath before a magistrate, whether or not he knew the offender or offenders, or any of them: and an examination on oath, in which the party only swore that he suspected that the fact was done by some person or persons to him unknown, is not sufficient within the statute; still less in support of an averment in the declaration, that he gave in such examination, &c., in and by which it appeared that the plaintiff did not know the person or persons who committed the fact. For non constat by the terms of such examination, that the plaintiff did not know some of the offenders if there were several.

By the proposals of the Phænix Company, it is stipulated that "persons insured shall give notice of the loss forthwith, deliver in an account, and procure a certificate of the minister and church-wardens, &c. importing that they knew the character, &c. of the assured, and believe that he really sustained the loss without fraud;" the procuring such certificate is a condition precedent to the right of the assured to recover on the policy; and it is immaterial that the minister, &c. wrongfully refused to sign the certificate. Worsly v. Wood, in error. 6 Term Rep. 720.

If there be a day set for the payment of money, or doing the thing which one promises, agrees, or covenants to do for another thing, and that day happens to incur before the time, the thing for which the promise, agreement, or covenant is made, is to be performed by the tenor of the agreement; there, though the words be, that the party shall pay the money, or do the thing for such a thing, or in consideration of such a thing; after the day is past the other shall have action for the money, or or other thing, though the thing for which the promise, agreement, or covenant was made, be not performed; for it would be repugnant there to make it a condition precedent; and therefore they are in that case left to mutual remedies, on which, by the express words of the agreement, they have depended. Per Holt, C. J. 12 Mod. 461: Pasch. 13 W. 3. Thorp v. Thorp.

M. agrees to give A. so much for the use of a coach and horses for a year, and A. agreed farther with M. to keep the coach in repair; it was averred the coach and horses were delivered to M. but nothing of the repair; and Holt, C. J. held upon this evidence, that repairing was not a condition precedent, and therefore need not be averred. Per Holt, C. J. at Guildhall, and judgment pro querente. 12 Mod. 503. Pasch. 13 W. 3. Atkinson v. Morris.

But if the agreement had been, that A. had agreed to give M. a coach and horses for a year, and to repair the coach, and that for that M. promised so much money, then the repairing had been a condition precedent necessary to be averred. Per Holt, C. J. 12 Mod. 503. Pasch. 13 W. 3. in S. C. Condition that A. shall do, and for the doing B. shall pay, is a condition precedent, but time fixed for payment will verify the condition. Per Holt, C. J. 1 Salk. 171. Pasch. 13 W. 3. B. R. Thorp v. Thorp. See this Dict. tit. Award.

If A. makes a lease for five years to B. upon condition that B. pays him 10l. within two years, that then he shall have a fee-simple in the lands, and make livery and seisin to B.; this passes the freehold immediately, and B. has a fee conditional: because if the freehold was not to vest in B. till the condition per-Thurtell v. formed, it would be difficult to determine in inserted in such deeds as are perfected privately, which might prove greatly prejudicial to strangers. Lit. § 350: Co. Lit. 216, 217.

But in case of a lease for life, with such a condition, the freehold passes not before the condition performed, because the livery may presently work upon the freehold. But if a man grants an advowson, &c. (which lie in grant) for years, upon such condition, the grantee shall have no fee till the condition performed. Co. Lit. 217.

If A. leases to B. for years, upon condition that if B. pays money to A. or his heirs, at a day, that B. shall have the fee, and before the day A. is attainted of treason and executed; now though the condition become impossible by the act and offence of A., yet B. shall not have a fee, because a precedent condition to increase an estate must be performed; and if it becomes impossible, no estate shall rise. Co. Lit. 210. Also in equity, with respect to conditions precedent and subsequent, the prevailing distinction seems to be, to relieve against the breach of non-performance, not so much whether the condition be precedent or subsequent, as whether a compensation can be made. 1 Vern. 79. 167. As if A. conveys lands to B., &c. and their heirs, upon trust, that if C., the son of A., within six months after the death of A., should secure to the trustees 500l. for the younger children of C., then after such security given, to convey to C. and his heirs, and until the time for giving such security, in trust for the eldest son of C., and in default of such security, to convey to such eldest son and his heirs, if C. dies before any such security given, yet this condition, though precedent, being only in nature of a penalty, the intent of the trust shall be regarded, which was to secure 500l. for the younger children. 1 Chan. Ca. 89.

If a feme covert, having power by will to devise lands, devises them to her executors, to pay 500l. out of them to her son; provided, that if the father gives not a sufficient release of certain goods to her executors, that then the devise of the 500l. should be void, and go to the executors; and after her death a release as tendered to the father, and he refuses; yet upon making the release after, the money shall be paid to the son; it was said to be the standing rule of the court, that a forfeiture should not bind, where a thing may be done .after, or a compensation made for it; as where the condition is to pay money, &c., and though it is generally binding, where there is a devise over, yet here, it being to go to the executors, it is no more than the law implies. 2 Vent.

CONE and KEY. A woman at the age of fourteen or fifteen years might take the charge of her house, and receive cone and key: cone or colne in the Sax. signifying computus; so that she was then held to be of competent years, when she was able to keep the accounts and keys of the house. Bract. lib. 2. cap. 37. And there is something to the same purpose in Glanv. lib. 7. cap. 9.

CONEY BURROWS. Places where conies or rabbits breed and haunt, &c. Commoners cannot lawfully dig up coney-burrows in the common. 2 Wils. 51. See tit. Common. CONIES. By stat. 7 and 8 G. 4. c. 29. §

30. persons unlawfully, in the night-time, taking or killing any coney, in any warren or ground lawfully used for breeding or keeping them, are guilty of a misdemeanor; and committing such offence in the day-time, or setting or using any engine for taking conies, are punished summarily before one magistrate. CONFEDERACY, confederatio.] Is when two or more combine together to do any damage or injury to another, or to do any unlawful act. And false confederacy between divers persons shall be punished, though nothing be put in execution; but this confederacy, punishable by law before it is executed, ought to have these incidents: first, it must be declared by some matter of prosecution, as by making of bonds or promises the one to the other; secondly, it should be malicious, as for unjust revenge; thirdly, it ought to be false against an innocent person; and lastly, it is to be out of court voluntarily. Terms de la Ley. Where a writ of conspiracy doth not lie, the conspiracy is punishable; and an inquiry shall be made of conspirators and confederators, who bind themselves together, &c. See post, tit. Conspiracy.

CONFESSION, confessio.] Is where a prisoner is indicted of treason or felony, and brought to the bar to be arraigned; and his indictment being read to him, the court demands what he can say thereto; then he either confesses the offence, and indictment to be true, or pleads not guilty, &c.

Confession may be made in two kinds, and to two several ends: the one is, that the criminal may confess the offence whereof he is indicted openly in the court, before the judge, and submit himself to the censure and judgment of the law; which confession is the most certain answer, and best satisfaction that may be given to the judge to condemn the offender, so that it proceeds freely of his own accord, without any threats or extremity used; for if the confession arise from any of these causes, it ought not to be recorded; as a woman indicted for the felonious taking of a thing from another, being thereof arraigned, confessed the felony, and said that she did it by command of her husband; the judges in made and repaired, and the lord mayor and pity would not record her confession, but caused her to plead not guilty to the felony; | bable circumstances, that such confession may whereupon the jury found that she did the fact by compulsion of her husband, against her will, for which cause she was discharged. 37 Assis. pl. 50. Persons, having nothing to do with the apprehension, prosecution, or examination of the prisoner, advised him to tell the truth, and consider his family; it was held that such advice was no ground for excluding a confession made an hour afterwards to the constable in prison. Rex v. Row, Russ. & Ry. Ca. 153. It seems that the confession of a prisoner is evidence against him, though there is no proof aliunde of the offence having been committed. Rex v. Falkner, Russ. & Ry. Ca. 481: Rex v. Fippet, ibid. 409.

The other kind of confession is, when the prisoner confesses the indictment to be true, and that he hath committed the offence whereof he is indicted, and then becomes an approver, or accuser of others, who are guilty of the same offence whereof he is indicted, or other offences with him; and then prays the judge to have a coroner assigned him, to whom he may make relation of those offences and the full circumstances thereof. See tit.

Accessory.

There was also a third sort of confession, formerly made by an offender in felony, not in court before the judge, but before the coroner in a church, or other privileged place, upon which the offender, by the ancient law of the land, was to abjure the realm. 3 Inst. 129. See tit. Abjuration.

Confession is likewise in civil cases, where the defendant confesses the plaintiff's action to be good: by which confession there may be a mitigation of a fine against the penalty of a statute; though not after verdict. Finch.

387: 2 Keb. 408.

There is also a confession indirectly implied, as well as directly expressed, in criminal cases; as if the defendant, in a case not capital, doth not directly own himself guilty of the crime, but by submitting to a fine owns his guilt: whereupon the judge may accept of his submission to the king's mercy. Lamb. lib. 4. c. 9. By this indirect confession, the defendant shall not be barred to plead not guilty to an action, &c. for the same fact: the entry of it is that the defendant puts himself on the king's mercy; and of the direct confession, that he acknowledges the indictment. And this last confession carries with it so strong a presumption of guilt, that being entered on record, on indictment of trespass, it estops the defendant to plead not guilty to an action brought afterwards against him for the same matter: but such entry of a confession of an indictment of a capital crime, it is said, will not estop a defendant to plead not guilty to an appeal, it being in case of life. And where a person upon his arraignment actually confesses himself guilty, or unadvisedly discloses the special manner of the fact, supposing that it doth not amount to felony, where it doth; the judges upon pro- | verb confirm proceed from fear, weakness, or ignorance, may refuse such a confession, and suffer the party to plead not guilty. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 31. § 2.

A confession may be received, and the plea of not guilty be withdrawn, though recorded. Kel. 11. The confession of the defendant, whether taken upon an examination before justices of peace, upon an offender's being bailed or committed for felony; or taken by the common law, upon an examination before a Secretary of State, or other magistrate, for treason or other crimes, is allowed to be given in evidence against the party confessing; but not against others. Also two witnesses of a confession of high treason, upon an examination before a justice of peace, were sufficient to convict the person so confessing, within the meaning of 1 Ed. 6. c. 12. and 5 & 6 Ed. 6. c. 11, which required two witnesses in high treason; unless the offender should willingly confess, &c. But the stat. 7 W. 3. c. 3. requires two witnesses, except the party shall willingly without violence confess, &c. in open court. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 46. § 3.—See tit. Evi dence.

It has been held, that wherever a man's confessi on is made use of against him, it must all be taken together, and not by parcels. 2 Hawk. 12. C. 46. § 5. And no confession shall, before final judgment, deprive the defendant of the privilege of taking exceptions in arrest of judgn rent, to faults apparent in the record. Ibid. c. : 12. § 4. A demurrer amounts to a confession of the indictment as laid, so far, that if the indictment be good, judgment and execution shall go against the prisoner. Bro. 86: S. P. C. 150: H. P. C. 246. And in criminal ca: ses, not capital, if the defendant demur to an i indictment, &c., whether in abatement or otherwise, the court will not give judgment against him to answer over, but final judgi nent. 2 Hawk. c. 32. § 7.—See tit. Abatement. Where a prisoner confesses the fact, the court has nothing more to do than proceed to judgment against him. CONFIRI MATION, confirmatio, from the are, firmum facere. A conveyance of an estate or right in esse, that one hath in or to lands, &c. to another that hath aut diminuens: Perficiens, as if feoffee upon the possession thereof, or some estate therein; condition make a feoffment, and the feoffor whereby a voidable estate is made sure and unavoidable; or a particular estate is increascd, or a possession made perfect. 1 Inst. 295. See Shep. Touch. 311. It is a strengthening of an estate formerly made, which is voidable, though not presently void: as for example, a bishop granteth his chancellorship by patent, for term of the patentee's life; this is no void grant, but voidable by the bishop's death, except it be strengthened by the confirmatoin of the dean and chapter.

Confirmation is also defined to be the approbation or assent to an estate already created; which as far as is in the confirmer's power, makes it good and valid: so that the confirmation doth not regularly create an estate, but yet such words may be mingled in the confirmation as may create and enlarge an estate; but that is by force of such words as are foreign to the business of confirmation, and by their own force and power, tend to create the estate. Gilb. Ten. 75.

A confirmation is of a nature nearly allied to a release; the words of making it are these, Have given, granted, ratified, approved, and confirmed. Litt. § 515. 531.

The words dedi et concessi, are as strong as the word confirmavi, for they amount to a grant of the right of the person in possession; and if he has any right, I can never after impeach his estate. Gilb. Ten. 79. See farther what words shall enure as a confirmation in Vin. Abr. tit. Confirmation (X.)

Madox in p. 19. of the Dissert. annexed to the Formul. Angl. says, that most ancient confirmations made after the Conquest, often run like feoffments; and are distinguishable from them chiefly by some words importing a former feoffment or grant.

In ancient times, when feoffees were frequently disseised of their lands upon some suggestions or other, charters of confirmation seem to have been in great request. For in the early times after the Conquest so many confirmations may be met with, successively made to the same persons, or their heirs or successors, of the same lands and possessions, that it looks as if they did not think themselves secure in their possessions against the king, or the great lords who were their feoffors, or in whose fees their lands lay, uhless they had repeated confirmations from them, their heirs or successors. And these confirmations very anciently seem to have been sometimes made, either by precept or writ from the king, or other lords, to put the feoffees, or their heirs or successors into seisin, after they had been disseised, or to keep them in their seisin undisturbed, or else by charter of express confirmation. Shep. Touc t. edit. 1791. p. 314. in n. And on this sulfject of confirmation in general, see Sheppard' & whole chapter.

Confirmation, aut est perficiens, crescens condition make a feoffment, and the feoffor confirm the estate of the second feoffee. Crescens, that doth always enlarge the estate of a tenant; as tenant for years, to hold for life, &c. Diminuens, as when the lord of whom the land is holden, confirms the estate of his tenant, to hold by a less rent. 9 Rep.

The lord may diminish the services of his tenant by confirmation; but not reserve new services, so long as the former state in the tenantcy continues; and therefore if he confirm to the tenant, to yield him a hawk, &c. yearly, it is void. Lit. § 539: 1 Co. Inst. 296. Leases for years may be confirmed for part of the term, or part of the land, &c. But it is otherwise of an estate of freehold, which being entire, cannot be confirmed for part of the estate. 5 Rep. 31. There may be a confirmation implied by law, as well as express by deed; where the law by construction makes a confirmation of a grant made to another purpose: and a confirmation may enlarge an estate, from an estate held at will to term of years, or a greater estate; from an estate for years to an estate for life; from an estate for life to an estate in tail, or in fee; and from an estate in tail to an estate in feesimple. 1 Inst. 305: 9 Rep. 142: Dyer, 263. But if the confirmation be made to lessee for life or years of his term or estate, and not of the land, this doth not increase the estate, though if the lessor confirm the land, to have and to hold the land to the lessee and his heirs, this will enlarge the estate, and so of the rest. Co. Lit. 299: Plowd. 40.

In every good confirmation there must be a precedent rightful or wrongful estate in him to whom made, or he must have the possession of the thing as a foundation for the confirmation to work upon; the confirmor must have such an estate and property in the land, that he may be thereby enabled to confirm the estate of the confirmee; the precedent estate must continue till the confirmation come, so that the estate to be increased comes into it; and it is required that both these estates be lawful. Co. Lit. 296: 1 Rep. 146: Dyer, 109: 5 Rep. 15. If one have common of pasture in another's land, and he confirms the estate of the tenant of the land, nothing passes of the common, but it remains as it was before: so if a man have a rent out of the land, and he doth confirm the estate which the tenant hath in the land, the rent remaineth. Lit. § 537.

Tenant for life makes a lease for years to a man, and after leases the land to another person for years; and he in reversion confirms the last lease, and after that the first lease, this is not good: the second lessee hath an interest before by the confirmation of him in reversion. But in a like case, confirmation of the first lease, after the second was confirmed, was held good; for the lease takes no but it is otherwise if for years. 2 Danv. Abr. interest by the confirmation, but only to make 141. If tenant for life grant a rent charge, it durable and effectual. Moor. c. 180: I Inst. &c. to one and his heirs, he in reversion is to 296: Plowd. 10.

If a disseisee confirm the land to the disseisor but for one hour, one week, a year, or for life, &c., it is a good confirmation of the estate for ever: and if he confirms the estate of the disseisor without any word of heirs, he hath a fee-simple; and if a disseisor make a gift in tail, and the disseisee doth confirm the estate of the donce, it shall enure to the whole estate; also if the disseisor enfeoffs A. and B. and the heirs of B., and the disseisee confirms the estate of B. for his life; this shall extend to his companion, and for the whole fee-simple. Co. Lit. 291, 297, 299.

But where the estate is divided, it is otherwise; as if there be an estate for life, the remainder over, there the confirmation may be of either of the estates; and if the lessee of a disseisor of a lease for twenty years make a lease for ten years, the disseisee may confirm to one of them, and not to the other. 1 Cro. 472: 5 Rep. 81. If a disseisor or any other make a lease for years to begin at a day to come, a confirmation to the lessee before the lease begins will not be good; for there is no estate in him. Co. Lit. 296.

The tenant in tail of land hath a reversion in fee expectant; in this case, the confirmation of the estate-tail will not extend to the reversion. And if my disseisor make a lease for life, the remainder in fee, and I confirm the estate of the tenant for life; this shall not confirm the estate of him in remainder: but if I confirm the remainder estate, without any confirmation to tenant for life, it shall enure to him also. Co. Lit. 297, 298. If lands are given to two men, and the heirs of their two bodies begotten, and the donor confirms their estate in the lands, to have and to hold to them two and their heirs; this shall be construed a joint estate for their lives, and after they shall have several inheritances. Co. Lit. 299. Tenant in tail, or for life, of land, lets it for years, if after he makes a confirmation of the land to the lessee for years, to hold to him and his heirs for ever, the lessee hath only an estate for the life of the tenant in tail, &c., and therein his lease for years is extinct. Lit. § 606.

A freehold for life, and term for years, it is said, cannot stand together of the same land, in the same person. 1 Nels. Abr. 480. feme lessee for years marries, and the lessor confirms the estate of husband and wife, to hold for their lives, by such a confirmation the term will be drowned; and the husband and wife are joint-tenants for their lives. Co. Lit. 300. But if the feme were lessee for life, then by the confirmation to husband and wife for their lives, the husband holdeth only in right of his wife for her life; but shall take a remainder for his life. Ibid. 299. Confirmation to lessee for life, and a stranger to hold of parsons, &c., by patron and ordinary. 1 for their lives, is void, for there is no privity: Inst. 237. 300, 301. Bishops may grant confirm it, otherwise it is good only for the life of tenant for life. Lit. 529. A tenant for life, and remainderman in fee, join in a lease; this shall be taken to be the lease of tenant for life, during his life, and confirmation of him in remainder: though after the death of tenant for life, it is the lease of him in remainder, and confirmation of tenant for life. 6 Rep. 15: 1 Nels. Abr. 481.

If lessee for years, without impeachment for waste, accepts a confirmation of his estate for life; by this he hath lost the privilege annexed to his estate for years. 8 Rep. 76. Acceptance of rent in some cases makes a confirmation of a lease: as if a man leases for life, reserving rent upon a condition of reentry; if after the condition is broken, by non-payment of the rent, the lessor distrains for the said rent, this act shall be a confirmation of the lease, so as he cannot enter. 2

What a person may defeat by his entry, he may make good by his confirmation. Co. Lit. But none can confirm, unless he hath a right at the time of the grant; he that hath but a right in reversion cannot enlarge the estate of a lessee. 2 Danv. 140, 141. And where a person hath but interesse termini, he hath no estate in him upon which a confirmation may enure. Co. Lit. 290.

As confirmation is to bind the right of him who makes it, but not alter the nature of the estate of him to whom made, it shall not discharge a condition. Poph. 51. If A. enfeoffs B. upon condition, and after A. confirms the estate of B., yet the condition remains: though if B. had enfeoffed C. so that the estate of C. had been only subject to the condition in another deed, and after A. had confirmed the estate of C., this would have extinguished the condition, which was annexed to the estate of 1 Rep. 147. A confirmation will take away a condition annexed by law: and by confirmation, a condition after broken in a deed of fcoffment is extinguished. 1 Co. Rep. 146. Confirmations may make a defeasible estate good; but cannot work upon an estate that is void in law. Co. Lit. 295.

A confirmation of letters-putent, which are void as they are against law, is a void confirmation. 1 Lil. Abr. 295. If there be lord and tenant, and the tenant having issue, is attainted of felony, if the king pardons him, nant dies, his issue shall not inherit, but the lord shall have it against his own confirmation: for that could not enable him to take by descent, who by the attainder of his father was disabled. 9 Rep. 141.

Grants and leases of bishops not warranted by the stat. 32 H. 8. c. 28. must be confirmed by dean and chapter; and grants and leases leases of their church-lands for three lives, or otherwise if he do not disclaim them. It is twenty-one years, having the qualities required by 32 H. 8. c. 28. and concurrent leases for twenty-one years, with confirmation of dean and chapter. See 1 El. cc. 4. 19. If a prebend leases parcel of his prebendary, and the bishop, who is patron, confirms it, this shall not bind the succeeding bishop, without confirmation of dean and chapter, because the patronage is parcel of the possessions of the bishoprick; but it shall bind the present bishop, &c. 2 Danv. 139. If a parson grants a rent, the confirmation of the patron and bishop is sufficient without the dean and chapter, and shall be good against the succeeding bishop. Ibid. 140. The dean of Wells may pass his possessions, with the assent of the chapter, without any confirmation of the bishop. Ibid. 135. Leases of bishops are affirmed ex assensu et consensu decani et totius capituli. See farther tit. Leases.

To the grants of a sole corporation, as parson, prebendary, vicar, and the like, the patron must give his consent, because such sole corporation has not the absolute fee; but a corporation aggregate, as dean and chapter, master, fellows, and scholars of a college, &c., or any sole corporation that has the absolute fee, as a bishop with consent of the dean and chapter, may by the common law make any grant of their possessions without their founder or patron. 1 Inst. 300. b. Bac. Abr. Leases. (G.)
A confirmation, as has been already said, is in nature of a release, and in some things is of greater force; and in this deed it is good to recite the estate of the tenant, as also of him that is to confirm it, and to mention the consideration; the words ratify and confirm are commonly made use of, but the words give, grant, demise, &c. by implication of law, may enure as a confirmation. 1 Inst. 295: West. CONFISCATE, or CONFISCATED. From the Lat. confiscare, and that from fiscus, which signifies metonymically the emperor's treasure; and as the Romans say, such goods as are forfeited to the emperor's treasury for any offence are bona confiscata, so we say of those that are forfeited to our king's Exchequer; and the title to have these goods is given to the king by the law, when they are not claimed by some other: as if a man be indicted for stealing the goods of another person, when they are, in truth, his own proper goods; and when the goods are brought into court against him, and he is asked what he says to the said goods, if he disclaims them then he shall lose the goods, although that afterwards he be acquitted of the felony, and the

the same where goods are found in the possession of a felon, if he disavows them, and afterwards is attainted for other goods, and not for them; for there the goods which he disavows are confiscate to the king; but had he been attainted for the same goods, they should have been said to be forfeited, and not confiscate. So if an appeal of robbery be brought, and the plaintiff leaves out some of his goods, he shall not be allowed to enlarge his appeal; and forasmuch as there is none to have the goods so left out, the king shall have them as confiscate, according to the rule, Quod non capit Christus, capit fiscus. Staund. P. C. lib. 3. cap. 24.

Goods confiscated are generally such as are arrested and seized for the king's use, but confiscure and forisfacere are said to be synonima; and bona confiscata are bona forisfacta. 3 Inst. 227. See tit. Forfeiture. CONFORMITY to the Church of England. See stat. 1 Eliz. c. 2. &c., and tits. Recusant, Nonconformist, Religion.

CONFUSION (property by). Where goods of two persons are so intermixed, that the several portions can no longer be distinguished, if the intermixture be by consent, it is supposed the proprietors have an interest in common, in proportion to their respective shares; but if one wilfully intermixes his money, corn, or hay, with that of another man, without his approbation or knowledge, or cast gold in like manner into another's melting pot or crucible, our law does not allow any remedy in such case; but gives the entire property, without any account, to him whose original dominion (or property) is invaded, and endeavoured to be rendered uncertain, without his own consent, 2 Com. 405. Confusion, in the Roman and French law, means the concurrence of two qualities in the same subject which mutually destroy each other, and takes place when the creditor becomes heir of his debtor; or vice versa, when the debtor becomes heir of his creditor; as to which see Pothier on Obligations or Contracts, vol. 1. p. 111. c. 5. translated by Evans.

CONGEABLE, from the Fr. congé, leave or permission.] Signifies in our law as much as lawful or lawfully done, or done with permission; as entry congeable, &c. Lit. Sect.

CONGE D'ACCORDER, Fr.] Leave to accord or agree, mentioned in the statute of fines, 8 Ed. 1. in these words:-When the original writ is delivered in the presence of the parties before justices, a pleader shall say king shall have them as confiscated; but it is this, Sir justice, congé d'accorder; and the justice shall say to him, What saith Sir R.?

CONJUGAL RIGHTS, or RITES. A suit for restitution of conjugal rights, is one of the species of matrimonial causes; and is brought when either the husband or wife is guilty of the injury of subtraction, or lives separate from the other without any sufficient reason; in which case the ecclesiastical jurisdiction will compel them to come together again, if either party be weak enough to desire it, contrary to the inclination of the other.

CONJURATIO, an oath; and conjuratus, the same with conjurator, viz. one who is bound by the same oath. Conjurare is where several affirm a thing by oath. Mon. Angl.

CONJURATION, conjuratio.] Signifies a plot or compact made by persons combining by oath to do any public harm; but was more especially used for the having (as was supposed) personal conference with the devil, or some evil spirit, to know any secret, or effect any purpose. The difference between conjuration and witchcraft was said to be, that a person using the one endeavoured, by prayers and invocations, to compel the devil to say or do what he commanded him: the other dealt rather by friendly and voluntary conference or agreement with the devil or familiar, to have his desires served, in lieu of blood or other gift offered. Both differed from enchantment or sorcery; because the latter were supposed to be personal conferences with the devil, and the former were but medicines and ceremonial form of words usually called charms, without apparition. Cowel.

Hawkins, in his Pleas of the Crown, lib. 1. c. 3. says, that conjurors are those who, by force of certain magic words, endeavour to raise the devil, and oblige him to execute their commands. Witches are such who, by way of conference, bargain with an evil spirit to do what they desire of him; and sorcerers are those who, by the use of certain superstitious words, or by the means of images, &c., are said to produce strange effects, above the ordinary course of nature. All which were anciently punished in the same manner as hereticks, by the writ de hæretico comburendo, after a sentence in the ecclesiastical court; and they might be condemned to the pillory, &c., upon an indictment at common law. 3 Inst. 44: H. P. C. 38.

The stats. 33 H. 8. c. 8. and 1 Jac. 1. c. 12. against conjuration and witchcraft, are repealed by stat. 9 G. 2. c. 5. which enacts, that no prosecution shall be commenced on the same; but where persons pretend to exercise any kind of witchcraft or conjuration, &c. or undertake to tell fortunes, or, from pretended skill in any crafty science, to discover where goods stolen or lost may be found; upon conviction, they shall be imprisoned a year, and stand in the pillory once in every quarter in some market-town, and may be ordered to give security for their good behaviour. And a subsequent stat. 3 G. 4. c. 83. § 4. punishes as rogues and vagabonds "every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and impose on any one." CONSENT. In all cases when any thing executory is created by deed, it may, by consent of all persons that were parties to the creation of it by their deed, be defeated and annulled, and therefore it was said that warranties, recognizances, rents, charges, annuities, covenants, leases for years, uses at common law, &c., may, by a defeasance made with the mutual consent of all that were parties to the creation of them by deed, be annulled, discharged, and defeated. 1 Rep. 113: Albany's Case.

CONSEQUENTIAL LOSSES or DAM.

AGES. It is a fundamental principle in law if it does; but if a sudden storm riseth, and reason, that he who does the first wrong shall answer for all consequential damages. 12 Mod. 396. Roswell v. Prior. But this admits of limitation. The damage must be the natural and lawful consequence of the defendant's act; not an unlawful act by a third party, for which that party is liable. 8 East, Though a man does a lawful thing, yet it any damage do thereby betall another, he shall answer if he could have avoided it; and this holds in all civil cases. As if a man lops a tree, and the boughs fall upon another ipso invito, yet an action lies. So if a man shoots at butts, and hurts another unawares. So if I have land through which a river runs to your mill, and I lop the sallows growing on the river side, which accidentally stop the water, so as your mill is hindered. So if I am building my own house, and a piece of timber falls on my neighbour's house, and breaks part of it. So if a man assaults me, and I lift up my staff to defend myself, and strike another in lifting it up; but it is otherwise in criminal cases, for there actus non fecit reum nisi mens sit rea. The general rule is, that if the injury is produced by immediate force on the plaintiff, whether wilful or otherwise, the remedy is trespass; but if the damage is only mediate or consequential upon some illegal act, the remedy is by action on the case.

CONSERVATOR, Lat.] A protector, preserver, or maintainer; or a standing arbitrator, chosen and appointed as a guarantee to compose and adjust differences that should arise between two parties, &c. Antiq. p. 513.

Conservator of the Peace, conservator vel custos pacis.] Is he that hath an especial charge to see the king's peace kept; and of these conservators Lambard saith, that before the reign of Ed. III., who first created justices of the peace, there were divers persons that by the common law had interest in keeping the peace; some whereof had that charge by tenure, as holding lands of the king by the service, &c.; and others as incideat to their offices which they bore, and so included in the same that they were never-theless called by the name of their office only; also some had it simply, as of itself, and were therefore named custodes pacis, wardens or conservators of the peace. chamberlain of Chester is a conservator of the peace in that county by virtue of his office. 4 Inst. 212. Sheriffs of counties at common law are conservators of the peace; and constables by the common law were conservators, but some say they were only subordinate to the conservators of the peace, as they are now to the justice.

The king's majesty is, by his office and dignity royal, the principal conservator of the peace within all his dominions; and may give authority to any other to see the peace kept, and to punish such as break it; hence it is usually called the king's peace. The Lord Chancellor or Keeper, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord High Steward of England, the Lord Mareschal, and Lord High Constable of England (when any such offices are in being), and all the justices of the Court of King's Bench (by virtue of their offices), and the Master of the Rolls (by prescription), are general conservators of the peace throughout the whole kingdom, and may commit all to keep it: the other judges are only so in | particular; and farther relating thereto, see their own courts. The coroner is also a conservator of the peace within his own county, as is also the sheriff; and both of them may take a recognizance or security for the peace. Constables, tithingmen, and the like, are also conservators of the peace within their own jurisdictions; and may apprehend all breakers of the peace, and commit them till they find sureties for their keeping it. 1 Comm. 350. See tits. Justices of Peace, Commitment.

CONSERVATOR OF THE TRUCE AND SAFE-Conducts, conservator nauciarum et salvorum regis conductuum.] Was an officer appointed by the king's letters patent, whose charge was to inquire of all offences done against the king's truce, and the safe-conducts upon the main sea, out of the liberties of the cinque ports, as the admirals customably were wont to do, and such other things as are declared in stat. 2 H. 5. st. 1. c. 6. Two men learned in the law were joined to conservators of the truce as associates; and masters of ships sworn not to attempt any thing against the truce, &c. And letters of request and of marque were to be granted when truce was broken at sea to make restitution. Stat. 4 H. 5. c. 7. See tit. Truce.

There was anciently a conservator of the privileges of the Hospitallers and Templars. Westm. 2. c. 43. And the corporation of the great level of the fens consists of a governor. six bailiffs, twenty conservators, and commonalty. Stat. 15 Car. 2. c. 17.

CONSIDERATIO CURIÆ, is often mentioned in law pleadings, and where matters are determined by the court. Ideo consideratum est per curiam, i. e. therefore it is considered and adjudged by the court; consideratio curiæ is the judgment of the court.

CONSIDERATION, consideratio.] The material cause, quid or pro quo, of any contract, without which it will not be effectual or This consideration is either expressed: as when a man bargains to give so much for a thing bought; or to sell his land for 100l., or grants it in exchange for other lands; or where I promise, that if one will marry my daughter, or build me a house, &c., I will give him a certain sum of money; or one agrees for a certain sum to do a thing. Or it is implied, when the law itself enforces a consideration; as where a person comes to an inn, and, there staying, eats and drinks, and takes lodging for himself and horse, the law presumes he intends to pay for both, though there be no express contract for it; and therefore if he discharge not the house, the host may stay his horse; and so if a tailor makes a garment for another, and there is no express agreement what he shall have for it, he may keep the clothes till he is paid, or sue the party for the same. 5 Rep. 29; Plowd. 308: Dyer, 30. 337.

Considerations may be considered either as relating to contracts generally or to deeds in 16. § 131. And as to the cases in which a tits. Assumpsit, Deed.

As to contracts, a consideration may be defined to be the reason which moves the contracting party to enter into the contracts. This consideration must be a thing lawful in itself, or else the contract is void. A good consideration is that of blood or natural affection between near relations; the satisfaction accruing from which the law esteems an equivalent for whatever benefit may move from one relation to another. 3 Rep. 83: 2 Inst. 271: 1 Rep. 176. This consideration may sometimes, however, be set aside, and the contract become void, when it tends in its consequences to defraud creditors or other third persons of their just rights. See 13 Eliz. c. 5: 3 Barn & Adol. 362. And natural affection, though a good consideration to raise a use, is not a sufficient consideration for a binding promise. Cro. Eliz. 755. But a contract for any valuable consideration, as for marriage, for money, for work done, or for other reciprocal contracts, can never be impeached at law; and if it be of a sufficiently adequate value, is never set aside in equity; for the person contracted with has then given an equivalent in recompence, and is therefore as much an owner or a creditor as any other person. 2 Comm. 444: Noy's Max. 87: Hob. 230. See tits. Fraud, Fraudulent Conveyance.

These valuable considerations are divided by the civilians into four species :- Do ut des,facio ut facias,-facio ut des,-do ut facias; the bare mention of which is here suffi-

A consideration of some sort or other is so absolutely necessary to the forming of a contract, that a nudum pactum, or bare agreement to do or pay any thing on one side without any compensation on the other, is totally void in law; and a man cannot be compelled to perform it. Dr. & St. d. 2. c. 24. As if one man promises to give another 100l.; here there is nothing contracted for or given on one side, and therefore there is nothing binding on the other. And however a man may or may not be bound to perform it in honour or conscience, which the municipal laws do not take upon them to decide, certainly those laws will not compel the execution of what he had no visible inducement to engage for, and therefore our law has adopted the maxim of the civil law ex nudo pacto non oritur actio. But any degree of reciprocity will prevent the pact from being nude; nay, even if the promise be founded on a prior moral obligation (as a promise to pay a just debt, though barred by the statute of limitations), it is no longer nudum pactum. But this promise must now be in writing. See 9 G. 4. c. 14. So a bankrupt is liable on a new promise to pay debts barred by his certificate, for it is founded on good consideration; but the promise must be in writing. 6 G. 4. c. moral obligation is sufficient to support an assumpsit, see 3 Bos. & Pull. 249: 5 Taun. 36: 1 Barn. & Adol. 104: 2 Barn. & Adol. And as this rule was principally established to avoid the inconvenience that would arise from setting up mere verbal promises, for which no good reason could be assigned, it therefore does not hold in some cases where such promise is authentically proved by written documents. 2 Comm. 445, 6. Blackstone instances voluntary bonds or notes; as to which latter, see Fonblanque's observations in

Deeds also must be founded upon good and sufficient considerations, not upon an usurious contract. Stat. 13 Eliz. c. 8. Nor upon fraud or collusion, either to deceive purchasers bona fide, or just and lawful creditors. Stats. 13 Eliz. c. 5: 27 Eliz. c. 4. Any of which bad considerations will vacate the deed, and subject such persons as put the same in ure to forfeitures, and often to imprisonments. A deed also, or other grant made without any consideration, is, as it were, of no effect; for it is construed to enure, or to be effectual, only to the use of the grantor himself. Perk. § 533. The consideration of deeds, also, like that of contracts, may be either a good or valuable one. Deeds made upon good consideration only are considered as merely voluntary, and are frequently set aside in favour of creditors, and bona fide purchasers. 2 Comm. 296. See 3 Barn. & Adol. 362. See farther tit. Deeds.

A consideration ought to be matter of profit and benefit to him to whom it is done, by reason of the charge or trouble of him who doth it. Cro. Car. 8. If a person hath disbursed several sums for another, without his request, and afterwards such other says, that in consideration he hath paid the said sums for him, he promises pay them: this is no consideration, because it was executed before. But it will be otherwise if the sums were paid at the request of the other. Moor. 220. Cro. Eliz. 282. A mere voluntary courtesy will not be a good consideration of a promise; but the value and proportion of the consideration is not material to maintain an action; for a shilling or a penny is as much binding as 100l.; though in these cases the jury will give damages proportionably to the loss. Hob.

5: 10 Rep. 76.

A consideration that is void in part, is void in the whole; and if two considerations be alleged, and one of them is found false by the jury, the action fails. Hob. 126: Cro. Eliz. 848. But if there be a double consideration, for the grounding of a promise, for the breach whereof an action is brought; though one of the considerations be not good, yet if the other be good, and the promise broken, the action will lie upon that breach: for one consideration is enough to support the promise. 1 Lill. 297. A consideration must be lawful to ground an assumpsit. 2 Lev. 161. It must not be contrary to any statute. 5 Barn. cause, &c.

& A. 241: 11 East, 300: 1 Maule & S. 593: 10 Barn. & C. 93. Nor contrary to public policy. 8 Term R. 92: 2 Barn. & C. 669. Nor fraudulent. 2 Term R. 763: 4 East, 372. Nor immoral. 1 Bos. & Pull. 340: 1 Ry. & Moo. 251. Where considerations are valuable, and consist of two or more parts, there the performance of every part ought to be shown. Cro. Eliz. 579. In case a deed of feoffment be made of lands, or a fine and recovery be passed, and no consideration is expressed in the deed, &c. for the doing thereof, it shall be intended by the law, that it was made in trust, for the use of the feoffor or conusor; for it shall be presumed he would not part with his land without a consideration; and yet the deed shall be construed to operate something, and that which is most reasonable. 1 Lill. CONSIGN, is a word used by merchants, where goods are assigned, delivered over, or transmitted from beyond sea or elsewhere to a factor, &c.

Consignor, and Consignee, signify, among merchants, the shipper of merchandize, and the person to whom they are addressed. Where the consignor of goods abroad advised the consignee by letter, that he had chartered a certain ship on his account, and inclosed him an invoice of the goods laden on board, which were therein expressed to be for account and risk of the consignee; and also a bill of lading in the usual form, expressing the delivery to be made to order, &c., he paying freight for the said goods, according to charter-party, and the letter of advice also informed the consignee that the consignor had drawn bills on him at three months for the value of the cargo; held, that the invoice and bill of lading sent to the consignee, and the delivery of the goods to the captain, vested the property in the consignee, subject only to be divested by the consignor's right to stop the goods in transitû, in case of the insolvency And the consignor's agent of the other. having obtained possession of the cargo under another bill of lading; and having refused to deliver it up unless the consignee would make immediate payment, which he declined doing, but offered his acceptances at three months, in the manner before stipulated: held, that the consignee might maintain trover against such agent without having tendered payment of the freight either to him or the captain, the defendant having possessed himself of the goods wrongfully. Walley v. Montgomery, E. 43 G. 3 East, 585. See farther tits. Merchant, Factor, Transitu.

CONSILIUM, dies consilii.] A time allowed for one accused to make his defence, and answer the charge of the accuser. It is now used for a speedy day appointed to argue a demurrer: which the court grants after the demurrer joined, on reading the record of the consimilities. This and the writ in casu proviso lay not at common law, but are given by stat. Gloc. 6 Ed. 1. c. 7. and Westm. 2. 13 Ed. 1. c. 24. for the reversioner after alienation; but during the life of the tenant in dower, or other tenant for life. See F. N. B. 205. 3 Comm. 183. n.

CONSISTORY, consistorium.] Signifies as much as prætorium, or tribunal; it is commonly used for a council-house of ecclesiastical persons, or place of justice in the spiritual court; a session or assembly of prelates. And every archbishop and bishop of every diocese hath a consistory court, held before his chancellor or commissary, in his cathedral church, or other convenient place of his diocese for ecclesiastical causes. 4 Inst. 338. bishop's chancellor is the judge of this court, supposed to be skilled in the civil and canon law; and in places of the diocese far remote from the bishop's consistory, the bishop appoints a commissary, (commissarius foraneus,) to judge in all causes within a certain district, and a register to enter his decrees, &c. 2 Rol. Abr. 286: Seld. Hist. Tithes, 413, 414. From the sentence of this consistory court an appeal lies by virtue of stat. 24 H. 8. c. 12. to the archbishop of each province respectively.

CONSOLIDATION, consolidatio.] Is used for the uniting of two benefices into one. Stat. 37 H. 8. c. 21. Which union is to be by the assent of the ordinary, patron, and incumbent, &cc. and to be of small churches lying near together. Vide tits. Church Union. This word is taken from the civil law, where it signifies properly an uniting of the possession, occupancy, or profit of lands, &c, with the property. See also Extinguishment Insurance. Where the court by rule consolidates several actions depending on the same question, so that all shall be decided by the event of one, this is called a consolidation rule, as to which see Tidd's Prac. (9th ed.) It is frequently done in actions against underwriters on the same policy.

CONSPIRACY, conspiratio.] This word was formerly used almost exclusively for an agreement of two or more persons falsely to indict one, or to procure him to be indicted of felony; and such person may still have his writ of conspiracy after his acquittal. Now, it is no less commonly used for the unlawful combination of journeymen to raise their wages, or to refuse working, except on certain stipulated conditions.

By the common law there can be no doubt but that all confederacies whatsoever, wrongfully to prejudice a third person, are highly criminal. I Hawk. P. C. c. 72. § 2. See farther stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4. particularly §§ 18, 19, 20. and this Dict. tits. Labourers, Servants.

Writ of conspiracy lies for him that is indicted of a trespass and acquitted, though it was not felony; also upon an indictment for a riot. 2 Mod. 306: 5 Mod. 405. Where a may prejudice his fame or reputation; and though it doth not import slander, if it endangers his liberty; or if the indictment be injurious to his property, &c. writ of conspiracy lieth. 3 Salk. 97. But though a conspiracy to charge falsely be indictable, yet the party ought to show himself to be innocent; and the writ of conspiracy lies not without an acquittal. Mod. Cas. 137. 185, 186. Not only writ of conspiracy, which is a civil action at the suit of the party, but also action on the case in the nature of a writ of conspiracy, doth lie for a false and malicious accusation of any crime, whether capital or not capital, even of high treason; and this though the bill of indictment is found ignoramus, or it does not go so far as an indictment. And the same damages may be recovered in such action as in a writ of conspiracy, where the party is lawfully acquitted by verdict. 1 Rol. Abr. 111, 112: 9 Rep. 56. See Gilb. Ca. 185: 10 Mod. 148. 214: Salk. 15. An action on the case is preferable, as being more in use, and the proceedings casier, and not attended with such niceties as the writ of conspiracy. See tits. Malicious Prosecution, Action.

If one falsely and maliciously procure another to be arrested and brought before a justice of peace to be examined concerning a felony, &c., on purpose to vex and disgrace him, and put him to charge and trouble, although he is not indicted for the same, yet he may have an action on the case; in which he need not aver that he was lawfully acquitted, as he ought to do in a writ of conspiracy; but he must aver that the accusation was false et maliciosè, which words are necessary in the declaration; and it must appear that there was no ground for it, and that the prosecution is at an end. And as an action on the case may be prosecuted against one person, where the writ of conspiracy or indictment doth not lie but against two, this action is most commonly brought. 1 Danv. Abr. 208. 213: 2 Inst. 562. 638. See tit. Malicious Prosecution.

Conspirators may be indicted at the suit of the king, and at the common law one may prefer an indictment against conspirators, who only conspire together, and nothing is executed; though the conspiracy ought to be de-clared by some act, or promise to stand by one another, &c. But a bare conspiracy will not maintain a writ of conspiracy at the suit of the party, because he is not damaged by it, though it is a ground for an indictment. 9 Rep. 56: 2 Rol. Abr. 77. If the defendants can show any foundation or probable cause of suspicion, they shall be discharged; and if a man hath good cause of suspicion that a person is guilty of felony, and causes him to be indicted, in prosecution of justice, action of conspiracy will not lie; but it is otherwise if the prosecutor imposes the crime of felony where no felony was committed. 1 Rol. Abr. '115: 4 Rep. 438.

An indictment will not lie for conspiracy to commit a civil trespass by several persons agreeing to go, and by going, into a preserve for game, the property of another, in order to snare hares, though alleged to be done by the defendants armed with offensive weapons, for the purpose of opposing resistance to any endeavours to apprehend or obstruct them. 13 E. The term conspiracy is of late years most frequently applied to unlawful combinations of workmen, generally to the prejudice of themselves as well as of all engaged in the trade to which such combinations relate. were many ancient and modern statutes on this subject, all of which are repealed by stat. 6 G. 4. c. 129. which extends to the whole of the United Kingdom. By this act the offences of forcing, or endeavouring to force, workmen by violence, threats, intimidation, &c. to leave their service, or to quit their work, or return it unfinished, or to prevent their hiring themselves, and for using vio-lence, &c. towards another, for compelling them to belong to clubs, or to pay fines for not obeying orders as to wages, or for forcing any master to alter mode of work, or limiting number of apprentices, &c., are made punishable by three months' imprisonment, with or without hard labour, § 3; not to affect meetings for settling of rates of wages, or hours of work, of the persons meeting, § 4; nor meetings of masters as to rates of wages, wages, &c. of their workmen, § 5; summary conviction before two justices (within four months), § 7; no justice, being a master, shall act under this act, § 13; punishment of witnesses summoned, and refusing to appear or be examined, three mouths' imprisonment, § 8: offenders compellable to give evidence for the crown, and shall be indemnified, § 6; forms of convictions and commitments, § 10 and Sch.; convictions shall be transmitted to quarter sessions, and filed, § 11; appeal to quarter sessions by parties grieved, § 12.

And against conspirators, false informers, and imbracers of inquest, the king hath provided a writ in the Chancery; and the justices of either bench and justices of assize shall on every plaint award inquest thereupon. Stat. 28 Ed. 1. st. 2. c. 10. From the description of conspirators in several of our old law books, conspiracy is taken generally, and confounded with maintenance and champerty. See those tits. CONSTABLE.—The origin of the word CONSTABLE, erroncously sought for in the Saxon language, is undoubtedly to be found in the comes stabuli of the Eastern empire, who was at first, as his title imports, no more than superintendant of the imperial stables, or in other words, the emperor's master of the horse; but having, in process of time, obtained the command of the army, his name (corrupted into constabulus and constabularius, see Spelman) began to signify a commander; and with this signification appears to have been introduced into England at the Norman Conquest; or perhaps sooner.

THE CONSTABLE OF ENGLAND, OF Lord High Constable, was anciently an officer of the highest dignity and importance in the realm. He was the leader of the king's armies, and had the cognizance of all contracts and other matters touching arms or war. 13 R. 2. st. 1. c. 2; and see Madox's History of the Exchequer, p. 27. He sate as judge with the earl marshal, having precedence of him in the court of chivalry; and he is by some of our books also called marshal. See tit. Mar-

This office, which appears to have been granted by William the Conqueror to Walter Earl of Gloucester, or according to others, to William Fitzosborne, or Roger de Mortimer, became hereditary in two different families, as annexed to the earldom of Hereford; and in that right, after a lapse of near two centuries, was revived by judgment of law, in the person of Edward Stafford, Duke of Bucking. ham; who being attainted of high treason, an. 13 H. 8. this office became forfeited to the crown. Since this period there has been no lord high constable, except pro hac vice at a coronation, or on other solemn occasions.

CONSTABLES OF CASTLES were keepers or governors of the castles of the king, or of great barons, and who were frequently hereditary or by feudal tenure; such were the don or Baypard's Castle, the constables of the Winton. Be this as it will, the discovery castles of Dover, Windsor, Chester, Flint, ought at least to teach those who are desirous &c., some of which offices, though not now hereditary, are remaining to this day. These are the constables intended in Magna Charta, c. 17. 20; and who, in the stat. of Westm. 1. (3) Ed. 1.) c. 15. are called constables of fees, and there considered as keepers of prisons; a constituent part, indeed, of all ancient castles. See 2 Inst. 31. The stat. of 5 H. 4. c. 10. reciting the oppressions of these constables, and enacting that none be imprisoned but in the common gaol, seems to have put an end to a race of tyrants, who by their misconduct of that court, p. 174.

The Constable of the Stuple is also mentioned in some old statutes. See 27 Ed. 3. c. 8: 15 R. 2. c. 9: 23 H. 8. c. 6.

THE CONSTABLE OF THE HUNDRED, or the High, Chief, or Head Constable (as he is othcrwise called,) is next to be spoken of. By the stat. of Winton or Winchester, 13 Ed. 1. (c. 6.) it is ordered that in every hundred or franchise there shall be chosen two constables to make the view of armour, and to present the defaults of armour, and of the suits of towns and of highways, &c.

Lambard (on Constables, p. 3.), Coke (4 Inst. 267.), and Hale (2 P. C. 96.), all agree in declaring that constables of the hundred were first introduced by this statute. (And see Cro. Eliz. 375.) And though it has been asserted that they were officers and conservators of the peace at common law, and that the stat. of Winton only enlarged their authority, yet no evidence has hitherto been produced to that purpose.—See Salk. 175. 381: 11 Mod. 215: 2 Ld. Raym. 1193. 5. The first mention made of the High Constable in any statute subsequent to that of Winton is in stat. 3 Ed. 4. c. 1.

Nothing, however, can be more certain than that the constable of the hundred, or High Constable, whether he be allowed an officer at the common law, or not, was instituted long before the stat. of Winton. This curious fact is ascertained by a writ or mandate of 36 H. 8. preserved in the Adversaria to Watts's edition of Matthew Paris, and from which c. 4. and 6. of the stat. of Winton are evidently taken; though it has hitherto escaped the notice of every writer or speaker upon the subject. By this writ it is provided, "that in every hundred there should be constituted a CHIEF CONSTABLE, at whose mandate all those of his hundred sworn to arms, should assemble and be observant to him, for the doing of those things which belong to the conservation of the king's peace." No mention of this officer, it is believed, can be any where found prior to the date of this instrument; which perhaps may no more determine the question as to his original creation than the stat. of of explaining the antiquities of our law, to look into matters of record, and to trust very

THE CONSTABLE OF THE VILL (OF Petty Constable, as he is frequently called, to distinguish him from the officer last mentioned), is he who is generally understood by the term constable when mentioned without any pe-

This constable has been repeatedly acknowledged by the law, to be "one of the most ancient officers in the realm for the conservation of the peace." Poph. 13: 4 Inst. 265. It must be confessed, however, that no mention of him by this identical name is any where found to occur anterior to the writ or mandate of King Henry III. already mentioned; whereby it is also provided, that in every village or township, there should be constituted a constable or two, according to the number of the inhabitants. But it is pretty certain that Lord Coke's idea is right, and that this officer is actually owing to the institution of the frankpledge, usually attributed to King Alfred, and was in fact originally the senior or chief pledge of the tithing or decima. See the stats. 2 Ed. 3. c. 3: 20 H. 6. c. 14: 28 H. 8. c. 10.

Thus it appears that the ordinance of Hen. III., the from instituting the office, merely enlarged the number of officers, placing them in towns and villages, instead of franchises; since it might frequently happen, that a manor of great extent had only a single constable for several townships; a case exactly similar, indeed, sometimes occurring at this day, where a township, comprehending several hamlets, equally populous it may be with itself, has only one constable for the whole. [For a constablewick cannot be created at this day, unless by act of parliament. 1 Mod. 13.

We find the Constable beginning to be familiarly known by that name in the time of King Edward I.; but not previously. some articles of inquiry at the Eyre, perhaps, or Trailbaston, certainly in the time of Edward I., are items in which this officer is mentioned. Coll. Madox. Mus. Brit. iii. 285. He seems also to be meant in the two chapters of the Eyre, as given in Fleta. lib. 1. c.

He is named in the stat. of 2 Ed. 3. c. 3. for the first time; as also in those of 4 Ed. 3. c. 10: 5 Ed. 3. c. 14: 25 Ed. 3. st. 1. c. 6: and 36 Ed. 3. st. 1. c. 2: and in several statutes now repealed or obsolete, in the reigns of R. 2., H. 4., and H. 6., 1 H. 7. c. 7. &c.

It seems highly probable that, at the common law, and before the mandate of Henry III., the constable of the hundred and the constable of the manor, were officers of the same nature and authority, originating at the same time, and differing only as to the extent of their several districts; in short, that they bore to each other the same analogy as subsisted between the bailiff of the hundred and the bailiff of the manor. It follows that the | c. 29. To enforce the laws against profane constable of the hundred neither possessed nor could have exercised any more authority within the precinct of the latter, than the constable of one manor possessed or could have exercised in another; the manor being to all intents and purposes exempt from, and excluded out of, the hundred.

Lord Bacon observes, that though the High Constable's authority hath the more ample circuit, "yet I do not find," says he, "that the petty constable is subordinate to the High Constable, or to be ordered or commanded by him." Those cases wherein it has been adjudged, that the being subject to a particular leet shall not excuse a man from serving the office of constable of the hundred, seem therefore to have been decided upon a wrong principle. See 3 Keb. 197. 230. 231: Freem. 348: 11 Mod. 215.

The powers and duties of this officer shall be considered under the following heads.

I. 1. His Quality; and 2. Qualifica-

II. 1. His Election; and 2. Who are excepted.

III. His Power and Authority.

IV. His Duty. [These two are in many instances co-extensive, and are therefore carefully to be compared to-

VI. His Responsibility and Punishment.

But first it may be necessary to state a few particulars as to the High Constable, or constable of the hundred or similar division; who is as much the officer of the justice of the peace as the constable of the vill. Fort. 128. He is elected at the leet or turn of the hundred, or by justices of the peace. 1 Rol. Abr. 535: Bulst. 174: 3 Keb. 197. And by stat. 29 G. 2. c. 25. § 8, 9. in Westminster a high constable is to be elected annually by the dean or high steward or his deputy at a court leet. -As to his power-he may hold petty or statute sessions (for hiring servants) according to ancient usage. Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4. But it is doubtful whether he can arrest for breach, or take surety of the peace. 1 Salk. 381: Cro. Eliz.375, 376. He is said to be an officer within the annual mutiny act, for billeting of soldiers; and liable to the penaltics thereby inflicted for malpractice in so doing; and he may occasionally make a deputy, whose acts in his 1 Blackst. principal's absence will be good. 350: 3 Burr. 1262: but see the act § 1.-Under stats. 39 Eliz. c. 20. and 13 G. 1. c. 23. he may determine complaints of clothiers, and see after abuses mentioned in those acts. His duty is-To present those who harbour strangers for whom they will not answer. 13 Ed. 1. c. 6. swearing. 19 G. 2. c. 21. To give notice to the constables of the orders of the lieutenant or deputy lieutenant as to the militia. 26 G. 3. c. 107. This officer is removable by the justices of the peace, on good cause. Bulst. 174: 1 Salk. 150. He shall be discharged from serving the office of collector of the poor's rate during his office. 2 Jones, 46.

I. 1. His Quality.—The constable was ordained to repress felons and to keep the peace, of which he is a conservator by the common law. 10 Ed. 4. 18: Cromp. Just. 201: 4 Inst.

His office is therefore, first, original or primitive, as conservator of the peace; and secondly, ministerial and relative to justices of the peace, coroners, sheriffs, &c., whose precepts he is to execute. 1 Hale, P. C. 88.

He is, however, an officer only for his own precinct, and cannot execute a warrant directed to the constable of the vill, or to all constables, generally, of that particular jurisdiction: for he is a constable no where else: nor is he compellable to do it, though the warrant be directed to him by name; but he may, if he will, and so indeed may any other person. 1 Hale, P. C. 459: Comb. 446: Carth. 508: 1 Salk. 176: 3 Salk. 99: 2 Ld. Raym. 1300: 12 Mod. 316: Fost. 312. n.: 2 Black. Rep. 1135: 1 H. Black. 13. See stat. 24 G. 2. c. 55. under which a constable may execute a warrant in any other county, &c. if indorsed by a justice of such other county, &c., and earry the offender before a justice of such other county, &c.; and if the offender shall give bail, the constable is to deliver the recognizance, examination, or confession, of the offender, and all other proceedings relating thereto, to the clerk of assizes, or clerk of the peace of the county, &c., where the offence was committed, under the penalty of 10l. But if the offence shall not be bailable, or the offender shall not give bail, the constable shall carry the offender before a justice of the county where the offence was committed.

He is an officer of the court of quarter-sessions, over whom they have power. Comb.

2. Qualifications.—The common law requires, that every constable should be idoneus homo, i. e. apt and fit to execute the said office; and he is said in law to be idoneus, who has these three things, honesty, knowledge, and ability: honesty, to execute his office truly, without malice, affection, or partiality; knowledge, to know what he ought duly to do; and ability, as well in estate as body, that he may intend and execute his office when need is, diligently; and not for impotence or poverty neglect it. 8 Rep. 41. b. : And if one be elected constable who is not idoneus, he by the law may be discharged of his office, and another who is idoneus appointed in his place.

He must be an inhabitant of the place for which he is chosen. 12 Mod. 256.

He ought not to be the keeper of a public house. 6 Mod. 42. And this is made an express disqualification in Westminster, by stat. 29 G. 3. c. 25.

II. 1. His Election.—The constable is chosen by the common law, at the leet, or, where there is no leet, at the tourn; sometimes by the suitors, and sometimes by the steward; and now in many towns and parishes by the parishioners; all according to ancient and particular usage. If he be present when chosen, he is to take the oath in court; if absent, he may be sworn before a (single) justice of the peace. But in the latter case he ought to have special notice of his election, and a time and place should be appointed for his taking the oath [well and truly to serve the office.] 4 Inst. 265: 2 Salk. 502: Comb. 416: 2 Jones, 212: Salk. 175: Ld. Roym. 70, 71: 2 Stra. 1119. 1149: 5 Mod. 130, 1: 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 10. § 46.

Corporations have no power at common law to elect a constable, and it can only be by prescription. 1 Ld. Raym. 94: 2 Salk. 52.

Constables of London (which city is divided into twenty-six wards, and every ward into precincts, in each whereof is a constable) are nominated by the inhabitants of each precinct on St. Thomas's day, and confirmed, or otherwise, at the court of wardmote; and after they are confirmed, they are sworn into their offices at a court of aldermen on the next Monday after Twelfth-day; their oath is long and particular, and goes to duties now seldom performed, but regulated by articles of the wardmote inquest, which directs the several matters to be observed by the constable; who is in the nature of a general superintendant of the morals of the inhabitants; and he ought to notice all new-comers, who, if of bad character, may be required to give security for their good behaviour, or be imprisoned; and see Carth. 129. 138. Every constable may execute warrants through the whole city.

In case a constable die, or quit the precinct, two justices may make and swear a new one, till the lord of the manor shall hold a court leet, or till the next quarter sessions, who may either approve of the constable so made, or appoint another. Also, if he continue above a year in office, the quarter sessions may discharge him, and put another in his place until the lord shall hold a court. But justices of the peace, either in or out of the quarter sessions, cannot in any other case discharge a constable chosen in the leet. It may save much trouble to the inquirer to class the objects of his power and authority, as well as those of his duty, in alphabetical order; a method in some measure formerly pursued in Law Dictionaries, but not with sufficient care and accuracy.

1. Affray.—If he see one making affray, or assaulting another, or breaking the peace, or hear or know one to menace, or threaten to kill, wound, maim, or beat another, the constable may take and set him in the stocks, or commit him to prison (as he may persons about to make an affray, and commanded to disperse) till the offender find surety to keep the peace or for his good behaviour. V. His Protection, Indemnity, and Allowances .- If a constable doth not his duty, he may be indicted and fined by the justices of peace; on the other hand he is protected by law in the execution of his duty.

It has been already mentioned that he shall have aid of the county to pacify affrays.

By stat. 7 Jac. 1. c. 5. if any action is brought against a constable, for any thing done by virtue of his office, he, and also all others who in his aid, or by his command, shall do any thing concerning his office, may plead the general issue, and give the special matter in evidence; and if he recovers he shall have double costs. But this must be certified on the record by the judge. 2 Vent. 45: Doug. 294.—And see stat. 19 G. 2. c. 21 against profane swearing, which gives treble costs.

By stat. 24 G. 2. c. 44. no action shall be brought against any constable, or other officer, or any person acting by his order, and in his aid, for any thing done in obedience to any warrant of a justice of peace, until demand of the perusal and copy of such warrant, and the same hath been refused or neglected by the space of six days; and in case after such demand, and compliance therewith, any action shall be brought against such constable, &c., without making the justice a defendant; then on producing and proving such warrant, the jury shall give a verdict for the defendant, notwithstanding any defect of jurisdiction in such justice: and if such action be brought jointly against such justice, and also against such constable, &c., then on proof of such warrant, the jury shall find for such constable, &c.; and if the verdict shall be given against the justice, the plaintiff shall recover his costs against him to be taxed so as to include costs plaintiff shall be liable to pay to such defendant, &c. No action shall be brought against any constable, &c. unless commenced within six calendar months after the act committed. This statute extends only to actions of tort. See Buller's N. P. 24.

F. yeoman, constable of the township [manor, &c.] of C. aforesaid, in the sum of forty pounds, to be paid to the said E. F. or his certain attorney, executors, administrators or assigns; for which payment, to be well and faithfully made, I bind myself, my heirs, executors, and administrators, firmly by these presents, sealed with my seal. Dated this in the 30th year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord George the Third, by the Grace of God of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth, and in the year of our Lord 1790.

The condition of the above written obligation is such, that if the above bounden A. B. shall [personally appear at the next general quarter sessions of the peace, to be holden in and for the county of D. to do and receive what shall be there and then enjoined him by the court, and in the mean time shall] keep the peace [and be of good behaviour] toward the King and all his liege people, and especially toward G. R. of C. in the said county, yeoman, then the said obligation to be void, or else to remain in full force and virtue.

Signed, sealed, and delivered ? in the presence of

OATH OF THE APPRAISERS OF GOODS DISTRAIN-ED FOR RENT; TO BE ADMINISTERED BY THE CONSTABLE.

You shall swear that you will faithfully appraise and value the goods now taken in distress, and mentioned in the inventory to you shown, as between buyer and seller, according to the best of your skill and understanding. So help you God.

APPOINTMENT OF A DEPUTY.

I, A. B. Constable of C. in the county of D. do hereby make, substitute, and appoint E. F. of the same place, yeoman, my true and lawful deputy in the office aforesaid, as long as I shall hold the same; or thus, during the continuance of my will and pleasure, [or for any particular purpose] dated &c.

The name of a certifi-CONSTAT, Lat.] cate, which the clerk of the pipe, and auditors of the Exchequer, make at the request of any person who intends to plead or move in that court, for the discharge of any thing; and the effect of it is, the certifying what constat (appears) upon record, touching the matter in question. See stats. 3 and 4 Ed. 6. c. 4: 13 Eliz. c. 6. A constat is held to be superior to an ordinary certificate, because it contains nothing but what is evident on record. An exemplification under the great seal, of the inrolment of any letters patent is called a constat. Co. Lit. 225.

CONSTRUCTIVE TREASON. See title Treason.

CONSUETUDINARIUS. A ritual or book, containing the rites and forms of divine offices, or the customs of abbeys and monasteries: it is mentioned in Brampton.

CONSUETUDINIBUS ET SERVICIIS, is a writ of right close, which lies against the tenant that deforceth his lord of the rent or service due to him. Reg. Orig. 159: F. N. B. 151. When the writ is brought by the party in the right only, he shall accout of the seisin of his ancestor, and the writ to be in solicitation of chastity, dilapidations and the debet; but when he counts of his own seisin, then the writ is in the debet et solet, &c. And if the party say in the writ ut in redditibus et arreragiis, these words prove that the demandant himself was seised of the services; and then if he count in such writ of his ancestors, and not of his own seisin, the writ shall abate: so that if he will bring a writ of customs and services of the seisin of his ancestors, he ought to leave these words ut in redditibus, &c. out of the writ. Where a person brings a writ of customs and services against any tenant, and by count demands homage, the writ ought to make special mention thereof; as ut in homagio, &c., or the writ shall abate. New Nat. Brev. 330: F. N. B. 151. If this writ be brought against a tenant for life, where the remainder is over in fee, there the tenant may pray in aid of him in the remainder, &c.

CONSUL, Lat.] In our law books signifies an earl. Bract. l. 1. c. 8. tells us, that as comes is derived from comitatu, so consul is derived from consulendo: and in the laws of Edward the Confessor mention is made of vicecomites and viceconsules. Blount. Consuls among the ancient Romans were chief officers, of which two were yearly chosen to govern the city of Rome. Those who now pass under the name of consuls residing in England sent from foreign nations, and in foreign ports sent from England, are merchants, or persons of eminence and knowledge, appointed to take care of the affairs and interests of merchants. See Lex. Mer-

A resident merchant of London, who is appointed and acts as consul to a foreign prince, is not exempted from arrest upon Viveash v. Becker. Term mesne process. Rep. 3 Maule & S. 284. See tit. Arrest.

CONSULTA ECCLESIA. A church full, or provided for. Cowel.

CONSULTATION, consultatio.] A writ whereby a cause having been removed by prohibition from the Ecclesiastical Court, to the king's court, is returned thither again; for if the judges of the king's court, upon comparing the libel with the suggestion of the party, find the suggestion false, or not proved, and therefore the cause to be wrongfully called from the Ecclesiastical Court, then upon this consultation or deliberation they decree it to be returned; whereupon the writ in this case obtained is called a consultation. Reg. Orig. 44. &c. Stat. of Writ of Consultations, 24 Ed. 1.

This writ is in nature of a procedendo: but properly a consultation ought not to be granted but in case where a man cannot recover at the common law, in the kiug's courts. New Nat. Br. 119. Causes of which the ecclesiastical or spiritual courts have jurisdiction are of administrations, admissions of church repairs, celebration of divine service, divorces, fornication, heresy, incest, institution of clerks, marriage rites, oblations, obventions, ordinations, commutation of penance, pensions, procurations, schism, simony, tithes, probate of wills, &c.; and where a suit is in the Ecclesiastical Court, for any of these causes or the like, and not mixed with any temporal thing, if a suggestion is made for a prohibition, a consultation shall be awarded. 5 Rep. 9.

To move for a prohibition in another court, after motion in the Chancery, &c. on the same libel which is granted, is merely vexatious, for which a consultation shall be had. Cro. Eliz. 277. Where a consultation is granted upon the right of the thing in question, there a new prohibition shall never be granted on the same libel; but where granted upon any default of the prohibition, in form, &c., there a prohibition may be granted upon the same libel again. 1 Nels. Abr. 485. See tit. Prohibition.

CONTEMPT, contemptus.] A disobedience to the rules, orders or process of a court, which hath power to punish such offence; and one may be imprisoned for a contempt done in court; but not for a contempt out of court, or a private abuse. Cro. Eliz. 689. If a defendant in addressing the jury is guilty of a contempt, the judge at Nisi Prius has authority to fine him. 2 Barn. & A. 329. But for contempt out of court, an attachment may be granted. And for contempt in speaking of the court when a rule was served on the defendant, the court issued an attachment without a rule to show cause. Salk. 84: and see 2 Barn. & Adol. 395. Attachment also lies against one for contempt to the court, to bring in the offender to answer on interrogatories, &c., and if he cannot acquit himself, he shall be fined. 1 Lil. 305. If a sheriff, being required to return a writ, directed to him, doth not return the writ, it is a contempt: and this word is used for a kind of misdemeanor, by doing what one is forbidden: or not doing what he is commanded. 12 Rep. 36. And as this is sometimes a greater, and sometimes a lesser offence, so it is punished with greater or less punishment, by fine, and sometimes by imprisonment. Dyer, 128. 177: 1 Bulst. 85.

Contempt committed in the face of any court may be punised by fine. At a court leet the steward told defendant he was a resiant, who replied he lied: whereupon the steward fined him 20l.; and adjudged good without a prescription so to do, and debt lies for the fine. 3 Salk. 33.

If a jury be fined for contempt, they must be fined severally. Ibid. 1 Roll. Rcp. 32.

If a defendant in Chancery, on service of a subpana, does not appear within the time limited by the rules of the court, and plead, demur, or answer, to the bill against him, he clerks, adultery, appeals in ecclesiastical causis then said to be in contempt; and the reses, apostacy, general bastardy, blasphemy, spective processes of contempt are in successions. sive order awarded against him. These are tum est astimatio et conditionis forma, qua attachment; attachment with proclamations; a commission of rebellion: and, finally, a sequestration. 3 Comm. 443.

An attachment of contempt may issue against a bishop or other peer; but for not returning a fieri facias de bonis ecclesiasticis, it is proper to move against the chancellor, commissary, or official. Rex v. Bishop of St. Asaph, 1 Wils. 332.

It is a contempt to institute a suit fictitiously, though the demand is real, either to hurt any person or to get the opinion of the Coxe v. Phillips, Hardio. 237. 239. See farther tit. Attachment, and 4 Comm. 283.

Exhibiting in an assize town inflammatory publications respecting a crime about to be tried at the assizes, is not a contempt which a judge of assize can interfere to stop by committing the party exhibiting. Rex v. Gilham,

1 Moo. & Malk. 165.

Contempts against the king's prerogative are by refusing to assist him for the good of the public; either in his councils, by advice, if called upon; or in his wars, by personal service, for defence of the realm, against a rebellion or invasion. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 22.

Under this class may be ranked the neglecting to join the posse comitatus, or power of the county, being thereunto required by the sheriff or justices according to the stat. 2 H. 5. c. 8. (see tit. Riots;) which is a duty incumbent upon all that are fifteen years of age, under the degree of nobility, and able to

Lamb. Eliz. 315.

Contempts against the prerogative may also be by preferring the interests of a foreign potentate to those of our own; or doing or receiving any thing that may create an undue influence in favour of such extrinsic power; as by taking a pension from any foreign prince without the consent of the king. 3 Inst. 114. Or by disobeying the king's lawful commands; whether by writs issuing out of his courts of justice, or by a summons to attend his privy council; or by letters from the king to a subject, commanding him to return from beyond the sea (for disobedience to which his lands shall be seized till he doth return, and himself afterwards punished); or by his writ of ne exat regno, or proclamation commanding the subject to stay at home.

Disobedience to any of these commands is a high misprision and contempt; and so, lastly, is disobedience to any act of parliament, where no particular penalty is assigned; for then it is punishable, like the rest of these contempts, by fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the king's courts of justice. 4 Comm. 122. See also 1 Hawk. P. C. cc. 22, 23, 24. And this Dict. titles Oaths, King.

CONTENEMENT, contenementum.] said to signify a man's countenance or credit, which he hath together with, and by reason of, his freehold: in which sense it is used in stat. of 1 Ed. 3. and other statutes; and Spelman, in his Glossary, says, Contenemenquis in repub. subsistit. But contenement is more properly that which is necessary for the support and maintenance of men, agreeable to their several qualities or states of life. See Magna Charta, c. 14: and Glanvil. lib. 9. c. 8: and this Dict. tit. Distress.

CONTINGENT LEGACY. See tit. Le-gucy.

CONTINGENT REMAINDER. Contingent or executory remainders (whereby no present interest passes) are where the estate in remainder is limited to take effect either to a dubious and uncertain person, or upon a dubious or uncertain event; so that the particular estate may chance to be determined, and the remainder never take effect. 3 Rep. 20: 2 Comm. 169. And see 10 Rep. 85. See this Dict. tits. Estate, Limitation, Remainder; and also tit. Executory Devise.

CONTINGENT USE, is a use limited in a conveyance of land, which may or may not happen to vest, according to the contingency expressed in the limitation of such use. use in contingency is such which by possibility may happen in possession, reversion, or remainder. 1 Rep. 121.

CONTINUAL CLAIM. See tit. Claim. CONTINUANCE, is the insuring of a cause in court by an entry upon the records there for that purpose. There is a continuance of the assize, &c. And continuance of a writ or action is from one term to another, in case where the sheriff hath not returned a former writ, issued out in the said action. Kitch. 262. Continuances and essoins are amendable upon the roll at any time before judgment: they are the acts of the court, and at common law they may amend their own acts before judgment, though in another term; but their judgments are only amendable in the same term wherein they are given. 3 Lev. 431. Upon an original, a term, or two or three terms, may be mesne between the testate and the return; and this shall be a good continuance, for the defendant is not at any prejudice by it, and the plaintiff may give a day to the defendant beyond the common day, if he will.

But a continuance by capias ought to be made from term to term, and there cannot be any mesne term, because the defendant ought not to stay so long in prison. 2 Danv. Abr. If a man recover upon demurrer, or by default, &c., and a writ of inquiry of damages is awarded, there ought to be continuances between the first and second judgment, otherwise it will be a discontinuance; for the first is but an award, and not complete till the second judgment, upon the return of the writ of inquiry of damages. Ibid. 153. If the plaintiff be nonsuit, by which the defendant is to recover costs; if the plaintiff will not enter his continuances, on purpose to save the costs, the defendant shall be suffered to enter them. Cro. Jac. 316, 317. The course of the Court of King's Bench is to enter no continuance upon the roll till after issue or demurrer, and then to enter the continuance of all upon the back before judgment; and if it is not entered, it is error. Trin. 16 Jac. B. R. Vide tits. Discontinuance, Process. And see Tidd's Prac. (9th edit.) but if day of payment be given, there the one may have an action for the money, and the other trover for the cloth. Dyer, 30. 293. Where a seller says to a buyer, he will sell his horse for so much, and the buyer says he Continuances are now abolished. See

Pleading. I. 3.

CONTINUANDO. A word used in special declaration of trespass, when the plaintiff would recover damages for several trespasses in the same action; and, to avoid multiplicity of suits, a man may in one action of trespass recover damages for many trespasses, laying the first to be done with a continuando to the whole time, in which the rest of the trespasses were done; which is in this form, Continuando (by continuing the trespass aforesaid, &c. from the day aforesaid, &c.) until such a day, including the last trespass. Terms de la Ley. See 3 Comm. 212: and tit. Trespass. In such case he can only prove a series of trespasses within the time laid.

CONTRABAND GOODS. From contra, and the Italian bando, an edict or proclamation.] Are those which are prohibited by act of parliament, or the king's proclamation, to be imported into, or exported out of this into any other nation. See tits. Navigation Acts, Customs.

CONTRACAUSATOR. A criminal, or one prosecuted for a crime: this word is mentioned in Leg. H. 1. cap. 61.

CONTRACT, contractus.] A covenant or agreement between two or more persons, with a lawful consideration or cause. West. Symb. part 1. As if a man sells his horse or other thing to another, for a sum of money, or covenants in consideration of 20l. to make him a lease of a farm, &c.; these are good contracts, because there is a quid pro quo, or one thing for another; but if a person make promise to me, that I shall have 20s., and that he will be debtor to me therefor, and after I demand the 20s. and he will not give it me, yet I shall never have any action to recover this 20s., because this promise was no contract, but a bare promise, or nudum pactum: though if any thing were given for the 20s., if it were but to the value of a penny, then it had been a good contract. See tit. Consideration.

Every contract doth imply in itself an assumpsit in law, to perform the same; for a contract would be to no purpose if there were no means to enforce the performance thereof.

1 Lill. Abr. 308. Where an action is brought upon a contract, and the plaintiff mistakes the sum agreed upon, he will fail in his action; but if he brings his action on the promise in law, which arises from the debt, there, although he mistakes the sum, he shall recover. Aleyn, 29. See tits. Action, Assumpsit.

There is a diversity where a day of payment is limited on a contract, and where not;

may have an action for the money, and the other trover for the cloth. Dyer, 30. 293. Where a seller says to a buyer, he will sell his horse for so much, and the buyer says he will give it; if he presently tell out the money, it is a contract; but if he do not, it is no contract. Noy's Max. 87: Hob. 41. property of any thing sold is in the buyer immediately by the contract; though regularly it must be delivered to the buyer before the seller can bring his action for the money. Noy, 88. If one contract to buy a horse or other thing of me, and no money is paid or earnest given, nor day set for payment thereof, nor the thing delivered; in these cases, no action will lie for the money, or the thing sold, but it may be sold to another. Plowd. 128. 309.

All contracts are to be certain, perfect, and complete: for an agreement to give so much for a thing as it shall be reasonably worth, is void for incertainty; so a promise to pay money in a short time, &c., or to give so much if he likes the thing when he sees it. Dyer, 91: 1 Bulst. 92. But if I contract with another to give him 10l. for such a thing, if I like it on seeing the same; this bargain is said to be perfect at my pleasure, though I may not take the thing before I have paid the money; if I do, the seller may have trespass against me; and if he sell it to another, I may bring an action on the case against him. Noy, 104. If a contract be to have for cattle sold 101., if the buyer do a certain thing, or else to have 201., it is a good contract, and certain enough. And if I agree with a person to give him so much for his horse as J. S. shall judge him worth, when he hath judged it the contract is complete, and an action will lie on it; and the buyer shall have a reasonable time to demand the judgment of J. S. But if he dies before the judgment is given, the contract is determined. Perk. § 112. 114: Shep. Abr. 294.

In contracts, the time is to be regarded in and from which the contract is made; the words shall be taken in the common and usual sense, as they are taken in that place where spoken; and the law doth not so much look upon the form of words as on the substance and mind of the parties therein. 5 Rep. 83: 1 Bulst. 175. A contract for goods may be made as well by word of mouth, as by deed in writing; and where it is in writing only, not sealed and delivered, it is all one as by word. But if the contract be by writing, sealed and delivered, and so turned into a deed, then it is of another nature; and in this case generally the action on the verbal contract is gone, and some other action lies for breach thereof. Plowd. 130. 309: Dyer,

Contracts not to be performed in a year are to be in writing, signed by the party, &c., or no action may be brought on them; but if no day is set, or the time is uncertain, they may be good without it. Stat. 29. Car. 2. c. 3. And by the same statute, no contract for the sale of goods for 10*l*. or upwards, shall be good, unless the buyer receive part of the goods sold, or give something in earnest to bind the contract: or some note thereof be made in writing, signed by the person charged with the contract, &c. See tits. Frauds, Agreement, III IV

If two persons come to a draper, and one says, "Let this man have so much cloth, and I will pay you;" there the sale is to the undertaker only, though the delivery is to another by his appointment; but if a contract be made with A. B., and the vendor scruples to let the goods go without money, and C. D. comes to him, and desires him to let A. B. have the goods, and undertakes that he shall pay him for them, that will be a promise within the stat. 29 Car. 2. c. 3. and ought to be in writing. Mod. Cas. 249.

A contract made and entered into upon good consideration, may for good considerations be dissolved. See Agreement and Sale. As to Usurious Contracts, see tit. Usury.

See the 9 G. 4. c. 14. § 7. as to executory contracts, under Sale.

CONTRAFACTION, contrafactio.] A counterfeiting, Contrafactio sigilli regis, a counterfeiting the king's seal. Blount.

CONTRA FORMAM COLLATIONIS. A writ that lay where a man had given lands in perpetual alms to any lay houses of religion, as to an abbot and convent, or to the warden or master of any hospital and his convent, to find certain poor men with necessaries, and do divine service, &c. If they aliened the land, to the disherison of the house and church, then the donor or his heirs should bring this writ to recover the lands. It was had against the abbot or his successor, not against the alienee, though he were tenant of the land; and was founded upon the stat. of Westm. 2. c. 1. Reg. Orig. 238: F. N. B. 210.

Contra formam Feoffamenti. A writ that lay for the heir of a tenant, enfeoffed of certain lands or tenements, by charter of feoffment from a lord to make certain services and suits to his court, who was afterwards distrained for more services than were mentioned in the charter. Reg. Orig. 176: Old.

Nat. Br. 162.

CONTRAMANDATIO PLACITI. A res-

by the same statute, no contract for the sale piting or giving a defendant farther time to of goods for 10l. or upwards, shall be good, answer, or a countermand of what was formless the buyer receive part of the goods merly ordered. Leg. H. 1. c. 59.

CONTRAMANDATUM. A lawful excuse which the defendant in a suit by attorney allegeth for himself, to show that the plaintiff hath no cause of complaint. Blount.

CONTRAPOSITIO. A plea or answer.

Leg. Hen. 1. c. 34.

CONTRARIENTS. In the reign of King Edward II. Thomas Earl of Lancaster taking part with the barons against the king, it was not thought fit, in respect of their great power, to call them rebels or traitors, but contrarients; and hence we have a record of those times called Rolulum Contrarientium.

CONTRATENERE, to withhold. Si quis decimus contrateneat. Leg. Alfredi apud

CONTRAVENTION, is the action founded on the breach of law-burrows. Scotch Dict.

CONTRIBUTION, contributio.] Is where every one pays his share, or contributes his part to any thing. One parcener shall have contribution against another; one heir have contribution against another heir, in equal degree; and one purchaser shall have contribution against another. Also conusors in a statute shall be equally charged, and not one of them solely extended. 3 Rep. 12, 13, &c. On a statute or recognisance there is a contribution and stay till the full age of the heir, &c.; and this doth extend to the lessee for life or years, of the conusor, who has part of the land liable, and the heir within age the residue; for the land of every one of them ought to be charged equally, because the whole is liable to the judgment; and this cannot be, if during the nonage the burthen shall fall upon one only. Jenk. Cent. 36. If lands are mortgaged, and then devised to one person for life, with remainder to another, both devises shall make contribution to payment of the mortgage-money. Chan. Cas. 224. 271. See tit. Mortgage.

Where goods are cast into the sea, for the safeguard of a ship, or other goods, &c. abroad in a tempest, there is a contribution among merchants, towards the loss of the owners. See tit. Insurance.

CONTRIBUTIONE FACIENDA. A writ that lieth where there are tenants in common, that are bound to do one thing, and one is put to the whole burthen; as where they jointly hold a mill pro indiviso, and take the profits equally, and the mill falling into decay, one of them will not repair the mill: now the other shall have a writ to compel him to contribute to the reparations. And if there be three coparceners of land that owe suit to the lord's court, and the eldest performs the whole; then may he have this writ to compel the others to make their contribution. So where one suit is required for land, and that land being sold to divers persons, suit is demanded of them all, or some of them, by distress, as entirely as if all the land were still in one. Reg. Orig. 175: two hundred years since, and now applied to F. N. B. 162.

CONTROLLER, Fr. conterolleur, Lat. contrarotulator.] An overseer or officer relating to public accounts, &c. And we have divers officers of this name, as controller of the king's household, of the navy, of the customs, of the excise, of the Mint, &c.; and in our courts there is the controller of the hamper, of the pipe, and of the pell, &c. The office of controller of the household is to control the accounts of the green cloth, and he sits with the lord steward, and other officers in the counting-house, for daily taking the accounts of all expenses of the household. The controller of the navy controls the payment of wages, examines and audits accounts, and inquires into rates of stores for shipping, &c. Controllers of the customs and excise, their office is to control the accounts of those revenues; and the controller of the Mint controls the payment of wages, and accounts relating to the Controller of the hamper is an officer in the Chancery, attending the lord chancellor daily in term time, and upon seal days, whose office is to take all things sealed from the clerk of the hamper, inclosed in bags of leather, and to note the just number and effect of all things so received, and enter the same in a book, with all the duties appertaining to his majesty and other officers for the The controller of the pipe is an officer of the Exchequer, who writes out summonses twice every year to the sheriffs, to levy the farms and debts of the pipe; and keeps a controlment of the pipes, &c. Controller of the pell is also an officer of the Exchequer, of which sort there are two, who are the chamberlain's clerks, that do or should keep a controlment of the pell, of receipts and goings out; and this officer was originally such as took notes of other officers' accounts or receipts, to the intent to discover if they dealt amiss, and was ordained for the prince's better security. Fleta, lib. 1. cap. 18: stat. 12 Ed. 3. c. 3. This last seems to be the original use and design of all controllers.

CONVENIENT, conveniens.] Of the use of this word, Sir Edw. Coke, in his Institutes, says, Non solum quod licet sed quod est conveniens est considerandum, nihil quod est inconveniens est licitum. 1 Inst. 66. Mr. Hargrave well observes on the passage, that arguments from inconvenience deserve the greatest attention; and where the weight of other reasoning is nearly on an equipoise, ought to turn the scale. But if the rule of law is clear and explicit, it is in vain to insist on inconveniences.

CONVENT, conventus.] Signifies the fraternity of an abbey, or priory, as societas doth the number of fellows in a college. Bract. lib. 2. c. 25. See tits. Monastery, Mortmain.

CONVENTICLE, conventiculum.] A private assembly or meeting for the exercise of religion, first used as a term of disgrace for the meetings of Wicliffe in this nation, above the illegal meetings of the non-conformists. It is mentioned in the stats. 2 H. 4. c. 15; 1 H. 6. c. 3; and 16 Car. 2. c. 4; which stat. was made to prevent and suppress conventicles; and by stat. 22 Car. 2. c. 1. it is enacted, that if any persons of the age of sixteen years, subjects of this kingdom, shall be present at any conventicle where there are five or more assembled, they shall be fined 5s. for the first offence, and 10s. for the second; and persons preaching incur a penalty of 201. Also suffering a meeting to be held in a house, &c. is liable to 201. penalty. Justices of peace have power to enter such houses, and seize persons assembled, &c. And if they neglect their duty, they shall forfeit 100l. And if any constable, &c. know of such meetings, and do not inform a justice of the peace, or chief magistrate, he shall forfeit 5l. But the stat. 1 W. & M. st. 1. c. 18. ordains that protestant dissenters shall be exempted from penalties; though, if they meet in a house, with the doors locked, barred, or bolted, such dissenters shall have no benefit from that stat. By stat. 52 G. 3. 155. the act 22 Car. 2. c. 1. was finally repealed. By stat. 10 Anne, c. 2. officers of the government, &c. present at any conventicle, at which there shall be ten persons, if the royal family be not prayed for in express words, shall forfeit 40l. and be disabled. See tits. Dissenters, Nonconformist, Religion.

CONVENTIO, an agreement or covenant; as A. B. queritur, &c. de C. D. &c. pro eo quod non teneat conventionem, &c. There is a strange record of the court of the manor of Hatfield, in Com. Ebor. held anno. 11 Ed. 3. relative to a convention to sell the Devil, and on earnest given, and non-delivery, action brought; which on hearing was adjourned in

CONVENTIONE. A writ for the breach of any covenant in writing, whether real or personal: a writ of covenant. Reg. Orig. 115: F. N. B. 145.

CONVENTION. A parliament assembled, but in which no act is passed, or bill signed. Dict.

The term convention is rather applied to the meeting of the Lords and Commons, without the assent of, or being called together by, the king, and which can only be justified ex necessitate rei.

Of this nature was the convention-parliament, which restored King Charles II., and which met above a month before his return: the Lords by their own authority, and the Commons in pursuance of writs issued in the name of the keepers of the liberty of England by authority of parliament. And if this convention had not so met, it was morally impossible that the kingdom should have been settled in peace.

In a similar manner, at the time of the Revolution, A. D. 1688, the Lords and Commons by their own authority, and upon the summons of the Prince of Orange, (afterwards William III.) met in a convention, and there- | and the increase of those converts, they bein disposed of the crown and kingdom. And it is declared by stat. 1 W. & M. st. 1. c. 1. that this convention was really the two houses of parliament, notwithstanding the want of writs or other defects of form.

If we may be allowed to suppose a possible case, that the whole royal line should at any time fail and become extinct, which would indisputably vacate the throne; in this situation it seems reasonable to presume that the body of the nation, consisting of Lords and Commons, would have a right to meet and settle the government: otherwise there must be no government at all. But whenever the throne is full, no national meeting, nor any meeting pretending to be such, can be legal, but the parliament assembled by command of the king. See tit. Parliament, and 1 Comm. 151, 2.

The constitution of Great Britain having placed the representation of the nation, and the expression of the national will, in the parliament, no other meeting or convention even of every individual in the kingdom, would be a competent organ to express that will; and meetings of such a nature tending merely to sedition, and to delude the people into an imaginary assertion of rights, which they had before delegated to their representatives in parliament, could only tend to introduce anarchy and confusion, and to overturn every settled principle of government. An act of parliament was passed in Ireland, in the year 1793, to prevent any such meetings or conventions: and a few ignorant individuals, who in the same year had dared to assemble under that title in Scotland, were quickly dispersed, and their leaders convicted of seditious practices; for which they were sentenced to transportation. See farther tits. Parliament, Treason, Seditious Assemblies.

CONVENTUALS. Religious men united together in a convent or religious house.

CONVENTUAL CHURCH. A church that consists of regular clerks, professing some order of religion: or of dean and chapter, or other societies of spiritual men.

CONVERSION, is where a person finding or having the goods of another in his possession, converts them to his own use, without the consent of the owner, and for which the proprietor may maintain an action of trover and conversion against him.—And refusal to restore goods is, primâ facie, sufficient evidence of a conversion, though it does not amount to a conversion. 10 Rep. 56: 3 Comm. 152. See tit. Trover.

CONVERSOS. The Jews here in England were formerly called Conversos, because they were converted to the Christian religion. King Hen. III. built a house for them in London, and allowed them a competent provision or subsistence for their lives; and this house was called Domus Conversorum. But by reason of the vast expences of the wars, came a burden to the crown; so that they were placed in abbeys and monasteries for their support and maintenance. Jews being afterwards banished, King Edward III. in the 51st year of his reign, gave this house which had been used for the converted Jews for the keeping of the rolls; and it is said to be the same which was till lately enjoyed by the master of the rolls. CONVEYANCE. A deed which passes or conveys land from one man to another. Conveyance by feoffment, and livery, was the general conveyance at common law; and if there was a tenant in possession, so that livery could not be made, then was the reversion granted, and the tenant always attorned; also upon the same reason a lease and release was held to be a good conveyance to pass an estate; but the lessee was to be in actual possession before the release. But the lease is now considered as operating so as to give the possession, which it does in point of law.

By the common law, when an estate did not pass by feoffment, the vendor made a lease for years, and the lessee actually entered; and the lessor granted the reversion to another, and the lessee attorned: afterwards, when an inheritance was to be granted, then likewise was a lease for years usually made, and the lessee entered (as before), and then the lessor released to him; but after the Statute of Uses, it became an opinion, that if a lease for years was made upon a valuable consideration, a release might operate upon it without an actual entry of the lessee; because the statute did execute the lease, and raised an use presently to the lessee: and Serjeant Moor was the first who practised this way. 2 Mod. 251,

The most common conveyances now in use are deeds of gift, bargain and sale, lease and release, fines and recoveries, settlements to

The following farther observations on conveyances at common law, and those which derive their effect from the Statute of Uses, are abridged from the long and learned note on 1 Inst. 271. b., to which the curious enquirer is referred for a more particular investigation of the subject. See also this Dict. tits. Deed, Estate, Lease and Release, Limitation, Trusts, Uses.

FEOFFMENTS and GRANTS were the two chief modes used in the common law for transferring property. The most comprehensive definition which can be given of a feoffment seems to be, a conveyance of corporeal hereditaments, by delivery of the possession, upon, or within view of, the hereditaments conveyed. This delivery was thus made, that the lord and the other tenants might be witnesses to it. No charter of feoffment was necessary; it only served as an authentication of the transaction; and when it was used, the lands were supposed to be transferred, not by the charter, but by the livery essential quality being that of transferring which it authenticated. Soon after the Conquest, or perhaps towards the end of the Saxon government, all estates were called fees: the original and proper import of the word feoffment is, the grant of a fee. It came afterwards to signify a grant with livery of seisin of a free inheritance to a man and his heirs: more respect being had to the perpetuity, than to the feudal tenure, of the estate granted. In early times, after the Conquest, char. ters of feoffment were various in point of form. In the time of Edward I. they began to be drawn up in a more uniform style. The more ancient of them generally run with the words dedi, concessi, or donavi. It was not till a later period that feoffavi came into use. The more ancient feoffments were also usually made in consideration of, or for the homage and service of the feoffee, and to hold of the feoffor and his heirs. But after the stat. quia emptores (18 Ed. 1. st. 1.) fcoffments were always made to hold to the chief lords of the fee, without the words pro homagio et servitio. See farther, 1 Inst. 6. a: 271. b.

The proper limitation of a feoffment is to a man and his heirs; but feoffments were often made of conditional fees (or of estates tail, as they are now called), and of life-estates; to which may be added, feoffments of estates given in frank-marriage and frankalmoigne. To make the feoffment complete, the feoffor used to give the feoffee seisin of the lands: this is what the feudists call investiture. It was often made by symbolical tradition, but it was always made upon or within view of the lands. When the king made a feoffment he issued his writ to the sheriff, or some other person to deliver seisin: other great men did the same; and this gave rise to powers of attorney. See Mad. Form. pref.

A GRANT in the original signification of the word is a conveyance or transfer of an incorporeal hereditament. As livery of seisin could not be had of these, the transfer of them was always made by writing, in order to produce that notoriety, which in the transfer of corporeal hereditaments was produced by delivery of the possession. But in other respects a feoffment and a grant did not materially differ. *

Such was the original distinction between a feoffment and a grant; but from this real difference in their subject matter only a difference was supposed to exist in their operation. A feoffment visibly operated on the possession; a grant could only operate on the right of the party conveying. Now as possession and freehold were synonymous terms, no person being considered to have the possession of the lands but he who had at least an estate of freehold in them, a conveyance which was considered as transferring the possession must necessarily be considered as transferring an things which did not lie in possession; they therefore could only transfer the right; that is, could only transfer that estate which the party had a right to convey. It is in this sense the expressions are to be understood, that a feoffment is a tortious and a grant a rightful conveyance. See tit. Disseisin.

This appears to have been the outline of conveyances at common law. The introduction of uses produced a great revolution in this respect. Uses at the common law were, in most respects, what trusts are now. When a feoffment was made to uses, the legal estate was in the feoffce. He filled the possession, did the feudal duties, and was in the eye of the law the tenant of the fee. The person to whose use he was seised, called the cestuy que use, had the beneficial property of the lands; had a right to the profits; and a right to call upon the feoffee to convey the estate to him, and to defend it against strangers. This right at first depended on the conscience of the feoffee; if he withheld the profits from the cestuy que use, or refused to convey the estate as he directed, the feoffee was without remedy. To redress this grievance the writ of subpæna was devised, or rather adopted from the common law courts, by the Court of Chancery, to oblige the feoffee to attend in court and disclose the trust; and then the court compelled him to execute it.

Thus uses were established: they were not considered as issuing out of, or annexed to the land, as a rent or condition, or a right of common; but as a trust reposed in the feoffee, that he should dispose of the lands at the discretion of the cestuy que use, permit him to receive the rents, and in all other respects have the beneficial property of the lands. To all other persons, except the cestuy que use, the feoffee was as much the real owner of the fee as if he did not hold it to the use of another: his wife was entitled to dower; his infant heir was in wardship to the lord; and upon his attainder the estate was forfeited.

To remedy these inconveniences, the stat. 27 H. 8. c. 10. was passed: by which the possession was divested out of the persons seised to the use and transferred to the cestur que use. For by that statute it is enacted, "that when any person shall be seised of any lands to the use, confidence, or trust of any other person or persons, by reason of any bargain, sale, feoffment, fine, recovery, contract, agreement, will, or otherwise: in such case the persons having the use, confidence, or trust, should from thenceforth be deemed and adjudged in lawful seisin, estate, and possession of and in the lands, in the same quality, manner, and form as they had before in the use."-There seems to be little doubt but that the intention of the legislature in passing this act was utterly to annihilate the existence of uses considered as distinct from the possession. But they have been preserved under the appellation of trusts. The courts hesitated much before they allowed them un. P. C. c. 10. A person convicted or attainted der this new name. And at length secret of one felony, may be prosecuted for another, modes of transferring the possession itself have been discovered, and have totally superseded that notorious and public mode of transferring property, which the common law required, and the statute intended to restore; and many modifications or limitations of real property have been allowed, which the common law did not admit. See tit. Lease and Release.

A son did give and grant lands to his mother, and her heirs; though this was a defective conveyance at common law, yet it was adjudged good by way of use, to support the intention of the donor, and therefore, by these words, an use did arise to the mother by way of covenant to stand seised. 2 Lev. 225. A feoffment without livery and seisin, will not enure as a grant; but where made in consideration of a marriage, &c., it has been adjudged, that it did enure as a covenant to stand seised to uses. 2 Lev. 213.

Now by these words it appeared, that the husband intended some benefit for his wife, wherefore the court supplied other words to make the conveyance sensible. 1 Lutw. 782; 1 Inst. 271. b. n.

CONVICT AND CONVICTION, convictus.] He that is found guilty of an offence by verdict of a jury. Staund. P. C. 186. Crompton saith, that conviction is either when a man is outlawed, or appeareth and confesseth, or is found guilty by the inquest: and when a statute excludes from clergy persons found guilty of felony, &c., it extends to those who are convicted by confession. Cromp. Just. 9. The law implies that there must be a conviction before pun-ishment, though it is not so mentioned in a statute: and where any statute makes a second offence felony, or subject to a heavier punishment than the first, it is always implied that such offence ought to be committed after a conviction for the first. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 10. § 9. c. 41. § 3.

Judgment amounts to conviction; though it doth not follow that every one who is convict is adjudged. A conviction at the king's on a penal statute: because while in force it makes the party liable to the forseiture, and highly consonant to the general principles of to bring accessaries to punishment, &c. Fitz. Coron. 379.

Persons convicted of felony by verdict, &c., are not to be admitted to bail, unless there be some special motive for granting it; as where a man is not the same person, &c., for bail ought to be before trial, when it stands indifferent whether the party be guilty, or not. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 15. § 45. 80. See tit. Bail.-Conviction of felony, and other crimes, disables a man to be a juror, witness, &c. In our books conviction and attainder are often confounded. See tit. A magistrate is bound to give a defendant, convicted by him, a copy of such conviction, on being thereto required. Barn. Rep. 1720. As to the defendant's right to have a copy of a record of acquittal, see 1 Barn. & Adol.

Summary Proceedings are directed by several acts of parliament for the conviction of offenders, and the inflicting of certain penalties imposed by those acts. In these there is no intervention of jury, but the party accused is acquitted or condemned by the suffrage of such person only as the statute has appointed for his judge.

Of this summary nature are all trials for offences and frauds contrary to the laws of the excise, and other branches of the revenue: which are to be inquired into and determined by the commissioners of the respective departments, or by justices of peace in the country. And experience has shown that such convictions are absolutely necessary for the due collection of the public money; and are, in fact, a species of mercy to the delinquents, who would be ruined by the expense and delay of frequent prosecutions by action or indictment.

Another branch of summary proceedings is that before justices of the peace, in order to inflict divers petty pecuniary mulcts, and corporal penalties, denounced by act of parliament, for many disorderly offences; such as common swearing, drunkenness, vagrancy, idleness, and a vast variety of others subjected to their jurisdiction. See tit. Justice of Peace, and the titles of the various offences throughout this Dict. These offences used formerly to be punished by the verdict of a jury in the court leets, and sheriff's tourn, the king's ancient courts of law; and which were formerly much revered and respected, but are now fallen very much into disuse and contempt.

The process of these summary convictions is extremely speedy. Though the courts of common law have thrown one check upon them, by making it necessary to summon the suit may be pleaded to a suit by an informer, party accused before he is condemned; which is now held an indispensable requisite, and is no one ought to be punished twice for the justice. See Stra. 261. 678: Salk. 181: 2 Ld. same offence: but conviction may not be Raym. 1405. After this summons, the mapleaded to a new suit by the king. 1 Hawk. gistrate may go on to examine one or more witnesses, as the statute may require, upon oath; and then make his conviction of the pardon, to a convict, see 7 and 8 G. 4. c. 28. § offender in writing; upon which he usually, issues his warrant, either to apprehend the of- before justices of the peace, see stat. 3 G. 4. fender, in case corporal punishment is to be inflicted on him; or else to levy the penalty in-curred by distress and sale of his goods, according to the directions of the several statutes which create the offences, or inflict the punishment; and which usually chalk out the method by which offenders are to be convicted in such particular cases.

The magistrates ought to state in the conviction the whole of the evidence for and against the defendant. 8 T. R. 220. And not merely the legal effect of such evidence in the words of a statute, though the latter form is valid; but the magistrate subjects himself to an information if he endeavour to shelter himself from detection by misstating such legal result, when the evidence would not warrant it. 9 E. A defendant who has been summoned may, on wilful default of appearance, be convicted of the offence; for if it were otherwise, every eriminal might avoid conviction. Stra. 44. And if a defendant appear and answer to the information, it cures the defect of his not being summoned. Burr. Rep. 1786. Regularly before a magistrate proceeds to hear and determine a case there should be an information in writing exhibited against the defendant for the offence, and this must be supported by the evidence. 1 Ld. CONVIVIUM, signifies the same among the laity as procuratio doth with the clergy, viz. when the tenant by reason of his tenure is bound to provide meat and drink for his lord once or oftener in the year. Blount.

CONVOCATION, convocatio.] The assembly of the representatives of the clergy of the two provinces of Canterbury and York, heretofore convened, to consult of ecclesiastical matters in time of parliament. The two convocations were distinct and independent of each other; and when they used to tax the clergy, the different convocations sometimes granted different subsidies. In 22 Henry VIII. the convocation of Canterbury had granted the king 100,000l., in consideration of which an act of parliament was passed, granting a free pardon to the clergy for all spiritual offences: but with a proviso that it should not extend to the province of York, unless its convocation would grant a subsidy in proportion; or unless its clergy would bind themselves individually to contribute as bountifully. This statute is recited at large in Gib. Cod. 77.

All deans and archdeacons were members of the convocation of their province; each chapter sending one proctor or representative, and the parochial clergy in each diocese of Canterbury two proctors; but on account of the small number of dioceses in the province of York, each archdeaconry elected two proctors. In York the convocation consisted only of one house; but for Canterbury of two houses, of which the twenty-two bishops formed the upper house; and before the Reformation, abbots, priors, and other mitred prelates, sat with the bishops. The lower house of convocation in the province of Canterbury consisted of twenty-two deans, fiftythree archdeacons, twenty-four proctors for the chapters, and forty-four proctors for the parochial clergy. Total, 144.

By stat. 8 H. 6. c. 1. the clergy in their attendance on the convocation had the same privilege in freedom from arrest as the members of the House of Commons, in their attendance on parliament.

The convocation is still summoned (as a matter of form) by the archbishop's writ, under the king's directions, along with every new parliament, to which assembly it bore analogy in its constituent parts and primary functions. In those assemblies subsidies were continually granted, payable by the clergy, and ecclesiastical canons were enacted. In a few instances under Henry VIII. and Elizabeth they were consulted as to momentous questions affecting the national religion. In sation of all business, that the convocation, 1533 the supremacy of the former monarch after a few formalities, either adjourned itself, was approved, and in 1562 the articles of faith were confirmed by the convocation. Their power to enact fresh canons without the king's licence was restrained by 25 H. 8. c. 19; and is now farther greatly limited by several later acts of parliament, such as the act of uniformity, the act confirming the Thirty-nine Articles of religion, the acts relating to non-residence, and other church matters; and still more perhaps by the doctrine gradually established in Westminster-hall, that new ecclesiastical canons are not binding on the laity. It seems therefore impossible that any authority of the convocation should be again exercised in any effectual manner, though on one point (the doctrinal disputes between Protestants and Papists) this might perhaps be desirable. During a long period the convocation (with the exception of 1603, when they established some regulations, and of 1640, an unfortunate precedent, when they attempted some more) had little business but to grant subsidies, which, however, from the time of Henry VIII., were always confirmed by act of parliament—an intimation, no doubt, that the legislature did not wholly acquiesce in their power, even of binding the clergy in a matter of property. This practice of ecclesiastical taxation was silently discontinued in 1664. See stat. 16 and 17 Car. 2. c. 1. by which the clergy were first charged in common with the laity, and discharged from the subsidies before granted in convocation; but with an express saving (§ 36, of the act) of their right to tax themselves in convocation should they think fit: but that has never been done since, the clergy having constantly been charged with the laity in all public aids. After that period the clergy assumed, and have been permitted to enjoy, the privilege of voting in the election of members of the House of Commons; and this right appears to be acknowledged by stats. 10 Anne, c. 23: 18 G. 2. c. 18. See Burnet's Reformation, Oxford edition, vol. 4. 508.

It has been observed also, that by this change in the mode of taxation, the clergy have obtained the solid advantage of being called upon to pay no heavier taxes than their fellow subjects, a benefit which was usually denied them when their own convocations, which were much under the influence of the divines expecting presents from the court, exercised the privilege of voting clerical supplies. See Kennett's Hist. Eng. vol. 3. p. 255. Upon the whole, therefore, clergymen have little or no reason to complain of their exclusion from the popular branch of the legislature. Their interests and that of religion are sufficiently protected by the prelates who still occupy that place in the great national council which has belonged to them even from the infancy of the English constitution. Soanes's Hist. Reformation, vol. 3. c. 3.

or was prorogued by a royal writ; nor had it. ever (with the few exceptions above noticed) sat for more than a few days for the purpose of voting its supply. But about the time of the Revolution the party most adverse to the then new order of things propagated a doctrine that the convocation ought to be advised with upon all questions affecting the church, and ought even to watch over its interests, as the parliament did over those of the kingdom. The Commons had so far encouraged this party, as to refer to the convocation the great question of a reform in the Liturgy for the sake of comprehension. It was not suffered to sit much during the rest of the reign of William III., to the great discontent of many of its members: one of the most celebrated of these, Atterbury (afterwards bishop of Rochester), published a book entitled, The Rights and Privileges of an English Convocation; but however specious the arguments for these rights and privileges may appear, and even were the perfect analogy of a convocation to a parliament fully admitted, there could be no doubt that the king might prorogue it at his pleasure, and that if neither money were required to be granted, nor laws to be enacted, a session would be very short. The church had by prescription a right to be summoned in convocation; but no prescription could be set up for its longer continuance than the crown thought expedient. In the year 1701, the lower house of convocation claimed a right of adjourning to a different day from that fixed by the upper, with other unprecedented claims, which were checked by a prorogation. Under the succeeding reign the convocation was in more activity for some years than at any former period, but they soon excited a flame which consumed themselves by an attack on Hoadley, bishop of Bangor, who had preached a sermon abounding with principles in favour of religious liberty, of which he had been long a celebrated asserter. The lower house of convocation, through the report of a committee, denounced the tenets of this discourse, as also those of a work not long before published by the bishop, as dangerous to the established church. A long (and for a time celebrated) war of pens took place, known by the name of the Bangorian Controversy. But as the principles of Hoadley and his adherents appeared in the main little else than those of Protestantism and toleration, the sentence of the laity was soon pronounced in their favour. The convocation was prorogued in 1717, and had never again sat for any business. Tindal, 539. [Butler, in his Rem. p. 95. cites 1720 as the era of this prorogation.]

The extinction of this Anglican great council has been deplored by some, and there are not wanting specious arguments for the expediency of such a synod. It might be urged, that the church, considered only as an integral member of the commonwealth, and the greatest corporation within it, might justly, writ that lay where a man could not get the claim that right of managing its own affairs which belongs to every other association. Answers to these and other suggestions might be, that the representation of the church in the House of Lords is sufficient for the protection of its interests, and that the clergy have an influence which no other corporation enjoys over the bulk of the nation, and, finally, that as the laws now stand the ratification of parliament must at all events be indispensable for any material change. COPY, copia.] In a legal sense the transcript of an original writing; as the copy of a patent, of a charter, deed, &c. A clause out of a patent, taken from the chapel of the Rolls, cannot be given in evidence; but there must be a true copy of the whole charter examined: it is the same of a record. And if upon a trial some part of an office copy is given in evidence to prove a deed, which deed is to prove the party's title to the land in question that gives it in evidence; if that part of the office copy given in evidence be not so much of it as doth any ways concern the land in question, the court will not admit of it: for the court will have a copy of the whole given, or no part of it shall be admitted. 1 Lil. A common deed cannot be proved by a copy or counterpart, when the original may be procured. 10 Rep. 92. And a copy of a will of lands, or the probate, is not sufficient; but the will must be shown as evidence. 2 Rol. Abr. 74. Copies of court rolls admitted as evidence. See at large title Evidence.

COPYHOLD, TENURA per copiam rotuli A tenure of lands in England, for which the tenant hath nothing to show but the copy of the rolls, made by the steward of the lord's court; on such tenant's being admitted to any parcel of land or tenement belonging to the manor. 4 Rep. 25. This tenure is very rare in Ircland. A tenure somewhat similar exists in Scotland, under the denomination of rental-right. Copyhold is called base-tenure, because held at the will of the lord, and Fitzherbert says, it was anciently tenure in villenage, and that copyhold is but a new name. See this Dict. title Tenures, III. 13. Some copyholds are held by the verge in ancient demesne: and though they are by copy, yet are they a kind of freehold; for if a tenant of such copyhold commit felony, the king hath the year, day, and waste, as in the case of freeholders: some other copyholds are such as the tenants hold by common tenure, called mere copyhold, whose land, upon felony committed, escheats to the lord of the manor. Kitch. 81. But copyhold land cannot be made at this day: for the pillars of a copyhold estate, are, That it hath been demised time

manor. 1 Inst. 58: 4 Rep. 24.

A copyhold cannot be created by operation of law; and therefore where wastes are severed from the manor by a grant of the latter, with the exception of the former, though the copyholders continue to have a right of common in the wastes by immemorial usage; yet if afterwards a grant of the soil of those wastes be made to trustees for the use of the copyholders in free socage, the lands, when inclosed, will be freehold, and not copyhold. 2 Term Rep. 415. 705.

A copyhold tenant had originally in judgment of law but an estate at will; yet custom so established his estate, that by the custom of the manor it was descendible, and his heirs inherited it; and therefore the estate of the copyholder is not merely at the will of the lord, but at the will of the lord according to the custom of the manor; so that the custom of the manor is the life of copyhold estates; for without a custom, or if copyholders break their custom, they are subject to the will of the lord; and as a copyhold is created by custom, so it is guided by custom. 4 Rep. 21. A copyholder, so long as he doth his services, and doth not break the custom of the manor, cannot be ejected by the lord: if he be, he shall have trespass against him: but if a copyholder refuses to perform his services, it is a breach of the custom, and forfeiture of his estate.

It appears that estates held by copy of court roll, but not at the will of the lord, have been deemed freehold by Lord Coke (see 1 Inst. 59. b) and others; and in order to distinguish them from the ordinary kind, hath been denominated customary freeholds. In consequence of the prevalence of this notion, a considerable number of such tenants claimed a right of voting as freeholders at the election of knights of the shire. This gave occasion to a short treatise on this subject, in which the origin of lands held in this peculiar way is traced; and it is proved that though these tenures in some respects resemble freeholds, they are in truth nothing more than a superior kind of copyhold. Soon after the publication of this treatise, the stat. 31 G. 2. c. 14. was passed, declaring that no person holding by copy of court-roll should be entitled to vote at the elections of knights of the shire. But now by 2 Will. 4. c. 45. § 19. copyholds of the annual value of 10l. give a vote for knights of the shire.

Lands held of a manor, which by the custom are conveyed by deed of bargain and sale, and also by surrender and admittance, are customary freeholds, and not copyholds.

If the lord of the manor purchase customary freeholds held of the manor, which are conveyed to him and his heirs by the ordinary assurances required by the custom, for the transfer of the customary freeholds, they will descend to his heirs, and not go with the manor to the remainder-man. The seignory is sus-out of mind by copy of court-roll; and that | pended during the life of the tenant for life, but revives on his decease. Bingham v. Woodgate, 1 Russ. & M. 33.

The freehold of an estate parcel of a manor, and demiscable only by leave of the lord, passing by surrender and admittance, to hold to the tenant and his heirs of the lord by the accustomed rent, &c., is in the lord, and not in the tenant, though not holden at the will of the lord. 7 E. R. 298.

One may hold the prima tonsura, or fore-crop of land, as copyhold, and another may have the soil, and every other beneficial enjoyment of it, as freehold. 7 E. R. 200.

In some manors where the custom hath been to permit the heir to succeed the ancestor in his tenure, the estates are styled Copyholds of Inheritance: in others, where the lords have been more vigilant to maintain their rights, they remain copyholds for life only. For the custom of the manor has in both cases so far superseded the will of the lord, that provided the pervices be performed, or stipulated for by fealty, he cannot in the first instance refuse to admit the heir of his tenant upon his death; nor in the second can he remove his present tenant so long as he lives, though he holds nominally by the precarious tenure of his lord's will. 2 Com. 97. 147. And see tit. Ancient Demesne.

If the lord refuse to admit he shall he compelled in Chancery. 2 Cro. 368. And if the lord refuse to admit a surrenderce, on account of a disagreement about the fine to be paid, the court of B. R. will grant a mandamus to compel the lord to admit without examining the right to the fine. 2 Term Rep. 484. But that the court will not grant a mandamus to admit a copyholder by descent: because without admittance he has a complete title against all the world but the lord. 2 Term Rep. 198.

One who has a primâ facie title to a copyhold is entitled to inspect the court rolls and take copies of them, so far as relates to the copyhold claimed; though no cause be depending for it at the time 10 E. R. 235.

Copyholds descend according to the rules and maxims of the common law (unless in particular manors, where there are contrary customs, of great antiquity); 1 T. R. 474; but such customary inheritances shall not be assets, to charge the heir in action of debt, &c. 4. Rep. 22: Kitch. Though a lease for one year of copyhold lands, which is warranted by the common law, shall be assets in the hands of an executor. 1 Vent. 163. Copyholders hold their estates free from charges of dower. being created by custom, which is paramount to title of dower. 4 Rep. 24. Copyhold inheritances have no collateral qualities which do not concern the descent; as to make them assets; or whereof a wife may be endowed; a husband be tenant by the curtesy, &c. But by particular custom there may be dower and tenancy by the curtesy, &c. Cro. Eliz.361. There may be an estate-tail in copyhold lands by custom, with the co-operation of the stat. W. 2. And as a copyhold may be entailed by maintaining, it shall be construed favourably: custom, so by custom the tail may be cut off Comp. Cop. § 33: Cro. El. 879. An unrea-

Where by special custom a descent of copyhold may be contrary to the rules of common law, such custom shall be interpreted strictly; thus, where there is a custom within a manor, that lands shall descend to the eldest sister, where there is neither a son nor a daughter: this shall not extend to an eldest niece: but in default of such a son, daughter, and sister, the lands must descend according to the rules of the common law. See 12 E. R. 62.

Evidence of reputation of the custom of a manor, that, in default of sons, the eldest daughter, and in default also of daughters the eldest sister, and in case of the death of all the descendants of the eldest daughter or sister, the descendants of the other daughters or sisters respectively of the person last seised, should take, is proper to be left to the jury of the existence of such a custom, as applied to a great nephew (the grandson of an elder sister) of the person last seised: although the instances in which it was proved to have been put in use extended no farther than those of eldest daughter and eldest sister, and the son of an eldest sister, Doe, d. Foster v. Sisson, 12 E. R. 62. The existence of such custom in adjacent manors seems to be no evidence of the custom in the particular manor. Ib.

Copyhold descending by custom to all the children equally of the tenant last seised, one of the parceners may maintain ejectment on his single demise for his own share. Roe, d. Raper v. Lansdale, 19 East's Rep. 39.

A copyhold may be barred by a recovery by special custom; and a surrender may bar the issue by custom. A fine and recovery at common law will not destroy a copyhold estate; because common law assurances do not work upon the assurance of the copyhold; though copyhold lands are within the stat. 4 H. 7. c. 24. of fines and proclamations, and five years' nonclaim, and shall be barred. 1 Rol. Abr. 536. See title Fines.

A plaint may be made in the court of the manor, in the nature of a real action, and a recovery shall be had in that plaint against tenant in tail, and such a recovery shall be a discontinuance in the estate-tail. 1 Brownl. 121. And the suffering a recovery by a copyholder tenant for life in the lord's court is no forfeiture, unless there is a particular custom for it. 1 Nels. Abr. 507. Copyholders may entail copyhold lands, and bar the entails and remainders, by committing a forfeiture, as making lease without licence, &c.; and then the lord is to make three proclamations, and seise the copyhold, after which the lands are granted to the copyholder, and his heirs, &c. This is the manner in some places, but it must be warranted by custom. 2 Danv. Abr. 191: Sid. 314.

Customs ought to be time out of memory, to be reasonable, &c. And a custom in deprivation or bar of a copyhold estate, shall be taken strictly; but when for making and maintaining, it shall be construed favourably: Comp. Cop. § 33: Cro. El. 879. An unreasonable custom, as for a lord to exact exorbitant fines; for a copyholder for life to cut down and fell timber-trees, &c. is void. A copyholder for life pleaded a custom, that every copyholder for life might, in the presence of two other copyholders, appoint who should have his copyhold after his death, and that the two copyholders might assess a fine, so as not to be less than had been usually paid; and it was adjudged a good custom. 4 Leon. 238. But a custom to compel a lord to make a grant, is said to be against law; though it may be good to admit a tenant. Moor, 788.

If there be a custom within a manor for a lord to grant parcels of the waste by copy of court-roll, the land granted by that mode is well described as copyhold, though the date of the grant be modern. 3 Bos. & Pul. 346.

The lord of the manor has no right to enter on a copyhold of inheritance, and cut timber for his own use, leaving sufficient for botes and estovers, unless there be a custom in the manor for his so doing. Whitechurch v.

Holworthy, 3 Maule & S. 340.

By the custom of some manors, where copyhold lands are granted to two or more persons for lives, the person first named in the copy may surrender all the lands. I Nels. Abr. 497. There are customs, ratione loci, different from other places: but though a custom may be applied to a particular place, yet it is against the nature of a custom of a manor to apply it to one particular tenant. I Nels. 504: 1 Lutw. 126.

A single instance of a surrender in fee, by tenant in special tail, of a copyhold estate, held evidence of a custom within the manor to bar entails by surrender, though the surrenderer had not been dead twenty years, and though one instance was proved of a recovery suffered by tenant in tail to bar the entail. 2

Maul. & Selw. Rep. 92.

A custom that all the customary tenants of a manor having gardens, parcel of their customary tenements respectively, have immemorially by themselves, their tenants, and occupiers, dug, taken, and carried away from a waste within the manor, to be used upon their said customary tenements, for the purpose of making and repairing grass plats in the gardens parcels of the same respectively, for the improvement thereof, such turf covered with grass fit for the pasture of cattle, as hath been fit and proper to be so used at all times of the year, as often and in such quantity as occasion hath required, is bad in law, as being indefinite and uncertain, and destructive of the common; and so is a similar custom for taking and applying such turf for the purpose of making and repairing the banks and mounds in, of, and for the hedges and fences of such customary tenements. 7 East's Rep.

When an act of parliament altereth the service, customs, tenure, and interest of land, in prejudice of the lord or tenant, there the general words of such an act shall not extend to copyholds. 3 Rep. 7. Copyholds are not within the stat. 27 H. 8. c. 10. of jointures ; nor stat. 32 H. 8. c. 28. of leases, copyholds being in their nature demisable only by copy: they are not within the statute of uses, nor are copyholds extendible in execution; but copyholds are within the statute of limitation of actions, and the statutes against bankrupts. The lord shall have the custody of the lands of idiots, &c. And a copyholder is not within the act 12 Car. 2. c. 24. to dispose of the custody and guardianship of the heir; for if there be a custom for it, it belongs to the lord of the manor. 3 Lev. 395: 1 Nels. Abr. 492.

Copyholders shall neither implead nor be impleaded for their tenements by writ, but by plaint in the lord's court held within the manor: and if on such plaint erroneous judgment be given, no writ of false judgment lies, but petition to the lord in nature of a writ of false judgment, wherein errors are to be assigned, and remedy given according to law. Where a man holds copyhold lands in trust to surrender to another, &c., if he refuses to surrender to the other accordingly, he may be compelled by bill exhibited in the lord's court, who, as chancellor, has power to do right. Leon. 2. A copyholder may have a formedon in descender in the lord's court. Lessee of a copyholder for life for one year shall maintain an ejectment. 4 Rep. 26: Moor, 679. It is every day's practice to bring ejectments to recover the possession of copyholds; for defendant by the rule, obliging himself to confess lease, entry, and ouster, the title only can come in question on the trial; but the lessor of plaintiff, before he brings his ejectment, should be admitted. See tit. Ejectment.

A manor is lost when there are no customary tenants or copyholders; and if a copyhold comes into the hands of the lord in fee, and the lord leases it for one year, or half a year, or for any certain time, it can never be granted by copy after; but if the lord alters the manor, &c., his alience may re-grant land by copy. If the lord keeps the copyhold for a long time in his hand, it is no impediment but that he may after grant it again by copy. 2 Danv. Abr. 176, 177. A copyholder may grant his estate to his lord, by bargain and sale, release, &c., for between lord and tenant the conveyance need not be according to custom. 1 Nels. 504. A copyholder in other cases cannot alien by deed; though he that hath a right only to a copyhold may release it by deed. And if a copyholder surrenders upon condition, he may afterwards release the condition by deed. Danv. 205: Cro. Jac. 36. Also one joint copyholder may release to another, which will be good without any admittance, &c. Ibid.

A copyholder cannot convey or transfer his copyhold estate to another, otherwise than by surrender; which is the yielding up of the land by the tenant to the lord, according to the custom of the manor, to the use of him that is to have the estate; or it is in order to a new grant, and farther estate on the same.

As to copyhold grants, which are made either in fee or for three lives, &c., the lord of the manor that hath a lawful estate therein, whether he be tenant for life or years, tenant by statute merchant, &c., or at will, is dominus pro tempore, and may grant lands, herbage of lands, a fair, mill, tithes, &c., and any thing that concerns lands, by copy of court-roll, according to custom; and such grants shall bind those in remainder: the rents and services reserved by them shall be annexed to the manor, and attend the owners thereof after their particular estates are ended. 4 Rep. 23: 11 Rep. 18. And if a lord of the manor for the time being, lessee for life, years, &c., take a surrender, and before admittance he dieth, or the years or interest determine, though the next lord comes in above the lease for life or years, or other particular interest, vet he shall be compelled to make admittance according to the surrender. Co. Lit. 59. But a lord at will of a copyhold manor cannot license a copyhold tenant to make a lease for years, though he may grant a copyhold for life according to the custom: if a lord for life gives license to a tenant to make a lease for years, this lease shall continue no longer than the life of the lord. 2 Danv. Abr. 202.

If he that is lord of the manor for the time being admits one to a copyhold, he dispenses with all precedent forfeitures, not only as to himself, but also as to him in reversion; for such grant and admittance amount to an entry for the forfeiture, and a new grant; but a lord by tort cannot by such admittance purge the forfeiture as to the rightful lord. 1 Lev. 26. Grants by copy of court-roll by infants, &c. will be binding; and if a guardian in socage grants a copyhold in reversion, according to the custom of the manor, this shall be a good grant. 2 Rol. Abr. 41. If baron and feme, seised of a manor in right of the feme, grant a copyhold, this shall bind the feme, notwithstanding her coverture. 4 Rep. 23. A manor may be held by copy of courtroll, and the lord of such manor may grant copies; and such customary manor may pass by surrender and admittance, &c. A customary manor may be holden of another manor, and such customary lord may grant copies and hold courts: but a copyholder, lord of such a manor, cannot hold a court baron to have forfeitures, and hold pleas in a writ of right, &c. 1 Nels. Abr. 524.

All grants of copyhold estates are to be according to the custom of the manor, and rents and services customary must be reserved; for what acts of the lord in granting copyholds are not confirmed by custom, but only strengthened by the power and interest of the lord, have no longer duration than the lord's estate continueth. Comp. Court Keeper, 421. If by the custom a copyhold may be granted for three lives, and the lord grants it to one for life, remainder to such a woman as he shall marry, and to the first son of his body; both these remainders are void; and a remainder limited upon a void estate in the creation will be likewise void. But if by custom it is demisable in fee, a surrender may be to the use of one for life, remainder in tail, remainder in fee. 5 Danv. Abr. 203: Cro. Eliz. 373. It is held, where by the custom of a manor the lord can grant a copyhold for three lives, he may grant it for an estate coming within the intent of the custom; as to A. B. and his assigns, to hold to him and his assigns for the lives of three others, and of the longer liver of them successively, &c. 2 Ld. Raym. 994. 1000.

The lord of a manor may himself grant a copyhold estate at any place out of the ma. nor; but the steward cannot grant a copyhold at a court held out of the manor. Rep. 26. Though the steward may take surrenders out of the manor, as well as the lord. 2 Danv. Abr. 181. A steward is in the place of the lord, and, without a command to the contrary, may grant lands by copy, &c. But if a lord command a steward that he shall not grant such a copy, if he grants it, it is void; and if the steward diminishes the ancient rents and services, the grant will be void. Cro. Eliz. 699.

Things of necessity done by a steward, who is but in reputed authority, are good if they come in by presentment of the jury; as the admittance of an heir upon presentment, &c. Though acts voluntary, as grants of copyhold, &c. are not good by such stewards. Cro. Eliz. 699. If an under-steward hold a court without any disturbance of the lord of the manor, though he hath no patent or deputation to hold it, yet it is good; because the tenants are not to examine what authority he hath, nor is he bound to give them an account of it. Moor, 110. A deputy steward may authorise another to do a particular act, 2 Salk, 95.

In admittances in court upon voluntary grants, the lord is proprietor; in admittances upon surrender, the lord is not proprietor of the lands, but only a necessary instrument of conveyance; and in admittance by descent the lord is a mere instrument, not being necessary to strengthen the heir's title, but only to give the lord his fine. 4 Rep. 21, 22. The heir of a copyholder may enter, and bring trespass, before admittance, being in by descent; and he may surrender before admittance; but he is not complete tenant to be sworn of the homage, or to maintain a plaint in the lord's court. And if the heir do not come in and be admitted, on the death of his ancestor, where the same is presented and proclamation made, he may forfeit his estate.

Cro. El. 90: 4 Kep. 22. 27.
On surrender of a copyhold, the surrenderer or person making the same, continues tenant till the admittance of the surrenderee; and the surrenderee may not enter upon the lands, or surrender before admittance, for he hath no estate till then; though it is otherwise of the heir by descent, who is in by course of law, and the custom casts the possession upon him. Comp. Court Keep. 436. And the heir may devise the copyhold before he has been admitted. 3 Barn. & Adol. 664. A surrender is not of any effect until admittance, and yet the surrenderee cannot be defrauded of the benefit of the surrender; for the surrenderer cannot pass away the land to another or make it subject to any other incumbrances; and if the lord refuse the surrenderee admittance, he is compellable in Chancery. Comp. Cop. § 39. A grantee hath no interest vested in him till he is admitted; but admittance of a copyholder for life is an admittance of him in remainder, for they are but one estate, and the remainderman may, after the death of tenant for life, surrender without admittance. 3 Lev. 308: Cro. El. 504.

The title to copyhold lands relates back to the time of the surrender, as against all persons except the lord; so that the surrenderee may recover in ejectment against the surrenderer on a demise laid between the times of surrender and admittance. 1 Term Rep. K. B. 600.

Every admittance upon a descent or surrender may be pleaded as a grant; and a person may allege the admittance of his ances. tor as a grant; and show the descent to him, and that he entered, &c. But he cannot plead that his father was seised in fee, &c., and that he died seised, and the land descended to him. 2 Danv. 208. Admittance on surrenders must in all respects agree with the surrender, the lord having only a customary power to admit secundum forman et effectum sursumredditionis. 4 Rep. 26. If any are admitted otherwise, they shall be seised acluntary surrender is general, without saying to whose use, a subsequent admittance may explain it. 2 Danv. 187. 204.

In voluntary admittances, if the lord admits any one contrary to custom, it shall not bind his heir or successor. If a copyholder surrender to the use of another, and after the lord, having knowledge of it, accepts the rent of such other out of court, this is an admittance in law; and any act, implying the consent of the lord to the surrender, shall be adjudged a good admittance. 1 Nels. Abr. 493. If the steward accept a fine of a copyholder, it amounts to an admittance. 2 Danv. 189. But delivering a copy is no admittance.

An enclosure made from the waste twelve or thirteen years before, and seen by the steward of the same lord from time to time without objection made, may be presumed by the jury to have been made by the licence of the lord, and ejectment cannot be brought against the tenant without previous notice to throw up the land. 11 E. R. 56.

Where a widow's estate is created by custom, that shall be an admittance in law; and her estate arising out of that of her husband's, his admittance is the admittance of her. Hut. 18. And she who hath a widow's estate by the custom of the manor, upon the death of her husband, need not pay a fine to the lord for the estate; for this is only a branch of the husband's. Hob. 181. When a custom is, that the wife of every copyholder for life shall have her free bench, after the death of the baron, the law casts the estate upon the wife, so that she shall have it before admittance, &c. 2 Danv. 184. But if a wife is entitled to her free bench by custom, and a copyholder in fee surrenders to the use of another, and then dies, it has been adjudged that the surrenderee should have the land, and not the wife, because the wife's title doth not commence till after the death of her husband; but the plaintiff's title begins with the surrender, and the admittance relates to that. Inst. 59: 1 Salk. 185.

The widow's title commences not by the marriage; if it did, then the husband could do nothing in his lifetime to prejudice it; but it is plain he may alien or extinguish his right, so as to bind the estate of the widow; the free bench grows out of the estate of the husband; and it is his dying seised which gives the widow a title; and as the husband has a defeasible estate, so the wife may have her free-bench defeated. 4 Mod. Rep. 452, 453.

Entries on the rolls of a manor of admissions of tenants in remainder after the determination of the estate of the last tenant's widow, who held during his chaste viduity, are evidence of a custom for the widow to hold on that condition, so as to maintain ejectment against her for a forfeiture on proof of her incontinence, although there was no instance cording to the surrender; yet where a vol- forfeiture having been enforced. 10 East's Rep. 520.

A copyholder may surrender in court by letter of attorney, and out of court by special custom. 9 Rep. 75, 76. A copyholder being in Ireland, the steward of a manor here made a commission to one to receive a surrender from him there; and it was held good. 2 Danv. 181.

The intent of surrenders is, that the lord may not be a stranger to his tenant, and the alteration of the estate. As a copyholder cannot transfer his estate to a stranger by any other conveyance than surrender, so if one would exchange a copyhold with another, both must surrender to each other's use, and the lord admit accordingly. Comp. Cop. s. 39.

With respect to the devising of copyholds, the law formerly was, that no such devise could be made without a surrender to the use of the party's will; and that the lands did not then pass by the will, but by the surrender, the will being considered only as declaratory of the uses of the surrender. Many evils were found to result in the cases of creditors, wives, and children, from this necessity of a surrender to a will, and the courts of equity were astute in finding reasons for supplying the surrender, with due precaution, in favour of the claims of the several parties. See 3 P. Wms. 98. in n.

All these questions are now set at rest by a statute passed for that purpose, 55 G. 3. c. 192. by which it is enacted, that in all cases where, by the custom of any manor in England for Ireland, though instances of copyhold are rare there,] any copyhold tenant of such manor may by will dispose of or charge land surrendered to the use of the will, every disposition or charge of any such copyhold, made by the will of any person who shall hereafter die, shall be as valid and effectual, although no surrender shall have been made to the use of the will, as if such surrender had been actually made. On admissions under testamentary dispositions, the steward is allowed to charge his fees, as in cases of a surrender to the use of the will. § 2. The act shall not render invalid any devise of copyhold which would be valid if the act had not been made. § 3. Since this act, a copyhold will pass under a general devise of real estate, though there be no surrender to the use of the will. 7 Bing. 275: 2 Sim. & Stu. 229: 6 Mad. 323.

In the case of copyholds devised to charitable uses, the want of surrender is made good, not by the discretion of the court, but by the strong and general words of stat. 43 Eliz. c. 4 Attorney-General v. Burdett, 2 Vern. 755: Duke's Char. Uses, 84: Attorney-General v. Andrews, 1 Vez. 225.

A cestui que trust may devise an interest in land, &c. without surrender; and if copyhold lands are in mortgage, the mortgagor can dispose of the equity of redempin fact stated on the rolls or known of such a tion by will, without any surrender made; because he hath at that time no estate in the | court, it is void. And where there are two joint tenants of a copyhold in fee, if one of them make a surrender to the use of his will, and die, and the devisee is admitted, the surrender and admittance shall bind the survivor. 2 Cro. 100.

A surrender of copyhold lands to the use of a will only operates on the estate which the surrenderer had at the time of the surrender: and therefore if a copyholder, having an estate pour autre vie, surrender all his estate in possession, remainder or expectancy, to the use of his will, and afterwards take the fee by descent, and then dispose of the fee by will. the fee will not pass by it. 6 Term Rep. 63.

Devisees of contingent remainders in a copyhold, not being in the seisin, cannot make a surrender of their interest, nor will such a surrender operate by estoppel against the parties or their heirs. 11 E. R. 185.

A surrender may not be to commence in futuro, as after the death of the surrenderer, &c. March, 177. A copyholder cannot surrender an estate absolutely to another, and leave a particular estate in himself, though he may surrender to uses, &c. A copyholder surrendered to the use of his wife and younger son, without mentioning what estate, and adjudged that they had an estate for life. Rep. 29. If a man having brought a copyhold to himself, his wife and daughter, and their heirs, afterwards surrender it to another, and his heirs, for securing a sum of money; after his death, the surrenderee shall not be entitled to the land, it being an advancement for the wife and daughter. 2 Vern. 120.

A feme covert may receive a copyhold estate, by surrender from her husband, because she comes not in immediately by him, but by the admittance of the lord, according to the surrender. 4 Rep. 29. b. A feme covert is to be secretly examined by the steward, on her surrendering her estate. Co. Lit. 59. An infant surrendered his copyhold, and afterwards entered at full age, and it was held lawful, though the surrenderee was admitted. Moor, 597.

By the general custom of copyhold estates, copyholders may surrender in court, and need not allege any particular custom to warrant it; but where they surrender out of court, into the hands of the lord by customary tenants, &c., custom must be pleaded. 9 Rep. 75: 1 Rol. Abr. 500. Surrenders out of court are to be presented at the next court: for it is not an effectual surrender till presented in court. Where a copyholder in fee surrenders out of court, and dies before it is presented, yet the surrender, being presented at the next court, will stand good, and cestui que use shall be admitted; so if cestui que use dies before it is presented, his heir shall be admitted. But the tenants by whose hands the surrender was made shall die, and this upon proof is presented in court, it is well enough. 4 Rep. 29.

Where, by the custom of a manor, surrenders are not required to be presented within a definite time, an incumbrancer whose family is not enrolled till after a subsequent incumbrancer, will not be postponed, though the subsequent incumbrancer had no notice of the prior charge, for the first incumbrancer has priority at law, and in this case equity will follow the law. Horlock v. Priestly, 2 Sim. 75.

Tenants refusing to make presentment are compellable in the lord's court. And by surrender of copyhold lands to the use of a mortgagee, the lands are bound in equity, though the surrender be not presented at the next court. 2 Salk. 449. When a copyholder surrenders upon condition, and this is presented absolutely, the presentment is void: but where a conditional surrender is presented, and the steward omits entering the condition, on proof thereof the condition shall not be avoided; but the rolls shall be amended. 4 Rep. 25. A copyledder may surrender to the use of another, reserving rent with a condition of re-entry for non-payment, and in default of payment may re-enter. Ibid. 21.

If a copyholder of inheritance takes a lease for years of his copyhold estate, it is a surrender in law of his copyhold. Where there is a tenant for life, and remander in fee, he in remainder may surrender his estate, if there be no custom to the contrary. 3 Leon. 329. If a surrender is made with remainders over, case lies, for him in remainder, against a copyholder for life, who commits waste, &c. Lev. 128. A surrenderee of a reversion of a copyhold is an assignee within the equity of the stat. 32 H. 8. c. 34. to bring action of debt or covenant against lessee, &c. 1 Salk. A copyholder in fee surrenders to the use of one for life, with remainder to another for life, remainder to another in fee; as the particular estates and remainders make but one estate, there is but one fine due to the lord. 2 Danv. 191.

The fruits and appendages of a copyhold tenure, that it hath in common with free tenures are, fealty, services (as well in rents as otherwise,) reliefs and escheats. The two latter belong only to copyholds of inheritance: the former to those for life also. But besides these, copyholds have also heriots, wardship, and fines. Heriots are incident to both species of copyhold, but wardship and fines to those of inheritance only. Wardship in copyhold estates partakes both of that in chivalry and that in socage. Like that in chivalry, the lord is the legal guardian, who usually assigns some relation of the infant tenant to act in his stead; and he, like guardian in socage, is accountable to his ward for the profits. Of fines, some are in the nature of primer seisins, due on the death of if the surrender be not presented at the next each tenant: others are mere fines for the alienation of the lands. In some manors only assess a compensation in lieu of heriot, to be one of these sorts can be demanded; in some paid by an in-coming copyholder, on surboth, and in others neither. They are sometimes arbitrary and at the will of the lord; sometimes fixed by custom: but even when arbitrary, the courts of law, in favour of the liberty of copyholders, have tied them down to be reasonable in their extent: otherwise they might amount to a disherison of the estate. No fine therefore is allowed to be taken upon descents or alienations (unless in particular circumstances) of more than two years' improved value of the estate. 2 Ch. Rep. 134. See 2 Comm. 97. As to the mode of calculating the fine where the estate is in several lives, see Wilson v. Houre, 2 B. & Adol. 350. In settling the value of the fine, the tenant is not concluded by the amount of rent he may have received on the premises, but may show their value to be less. 7 Bing.

and may be due on every change of the estate by lord or tenant. The lord may have an action of debt for his fine, or may distrain by custom. 4 Rep. 27: 13 Rep. 2.

A covenant made by a copy older with a stranger to assign and surrender his copyhold to him, which covenant is afterwards presented by the homagee, does not give the lord any right to a fine before admission. 2 T. R. 484. The lord may recover from a copyholder the fine assessed by him on admittance, not exceeding two years' value of the tenement, although there be no entry of the assessment of such fine on the court rolls, but only a demand of such a sum for a fine, after the value of the tenement had been found by the homagec. 6 E. R. 56.

Tenants in coparcenary of a copyhold estate are in law but one heir: and it seems that they are entitled to admittance upon the payment of one fine. 4 D. & R. 625: S. C. 3 B. & C. 173.

A copyholder in fee surrendered to the uses of his will, and devised successive estates to A. and B., remainder to his own right heirs. After the death of the copyholder, A. and B. disclaimed, released all their interest to the heir-at-law, and refused to be admitted. It was determined, that as the legal estate was in the testator, and descended to his heirat-law, he was entitled to be admitted in the character of heir as tenant in possession, though it was objected that the lord would then be deprived of the fines due in respect of the intermediate interests vesting in, and conveyed by, the devisees. R. v. Wilson, 10 B. & C. 80.

An heriot is a duty to the lord, rendered at the death of the tenant, or on a surrender and alienation of an estate, and is the best beast or goods, found in the possession of the tenant deceased, or otherwise, according to custom. And for heriots, reliefs, &c. the lord may distrain, or bring action of debt.—Plowd. 96.

Where a copyhold tenement, holden by heriot custom, becomes the property of several, as tenants in common, the lord is entitled to a heriot from each of them; but if the several portions are re-united in one person, one heriot only is payable. 6 B. & C. 2.

Relief is a sum of money which every copyholder in fee, or freeholder of a manor, pays to the lord, on the death of his ancestor, and is generally a year's profits of his land.

See tits. Tenure, Relief.

Copyholds escheat, and are forfeited in Fines are paid to the lord on admittances; many cases; escheat of a copyhold estate is either where the lands fall into the hands of the lord for want of an heir to inherit them, or where the copyholder commits felony, &c. But before the lord can enter on an estate escheated, the homage jury ought to present it.—Forfeitures proceeding from treasons, felonies, alienation by deed, &c., a presentment of them must be also made in court, that the lord may have notice of them. A copyholder refusing to do suit of court, being sufficiently warned, is a forfeiture of his es-tate, unless he be prevented by sickness, in-undations of water, &c. If the lord demandeth his rent, and the copyholder being present, denies to pay it at the time required, this is a forfeiture; but if the tenant be not upon the ground when demanded, the lord must continue his demand upon the land, so that by continual denial in law, it may amount to a denial in fact: though it is said there must be a demand from the person of the copyholder, and a wilful denial, to make a forfeiture.

If a copyholder do not perform the services due to his lord; or if he sue a replevin against the lord, upon the lord's lawful distress for his rent or services, these are forfeitures. If the lord upon admittance of a copyholder, the fine by the custom of the manor being certain, demandeth his fine, and the copyholder denieth to pay it upon demand, this is a forfeiture.

Upon the descent of any copyhold of inheritance, the heir by the general custom is tied, upon three solemn proclamations made at each of three several courts, to come in and be admitted to his copyhold; or if he faileth therein, this failure worketh a forfeiture.

The proclamations need not enumerate the particular estate of which the tenant died seized. 3 T. R. 162. Nor is it necessary they should be proved by viva voce testimony. The entry in the court rolls is sufficient. Ibid. A person claiming to be admitted as heir need not tender himself to be admitted at the lord's court, if the steward It seems that a custom for the homage to upon application to him out of court has refused to admit him. 2 Maul. & Selw. Rep. | wife shall enjoy the estate. Cro. Car. 7. And

A lord of a manor cannot seize a copyhold estate as forfeited pro defectu tenentis without a custom: therefore when on the death of a copyholder of inheritance, the lord, after three proclamations for the heir to come in, seized the estate into his hands, and afterwards granted it in fee to another, the court considered it as an absolute seizure, and consequently irregular, there being no custom to warrant it, and being irregular as an absolute seizure it could not afterwards be set up by the lord as a seizure quousque. 3 T. R. 162.

A forfeiture of a copyhold estate can only be taken advantage of by him who is lord at the time of the forfeiture, except in those cases where the act of forfeiture destroys the estate. 3 T. R. 162.

An idiot, lunatic, &c., though lately able to take copyholds, yet were unable to forfeit them: and in respect to others, forfeitures may be mitigated by custom, and the copyholder only amerced. Repealed by stat. 1 W. 4. c. 65. § 3-10. on default of infants and feme coverts appearing to be admitted tenants to copyhold lands, the lord or his steward may name a person to be guardian or attorney for them, and by such guardian, &c. admit them: and if the usual fine thereon be not paid in three months, being demanded in writing, the lord may enter on the copyhold, receive the rents, &c., till the fine is paid with all charges. And by this statute no infant or feme covert shall forfeit any copyhold lands for their neglect to come to court to be admitted, or refusal to pay any fine. See Infant, V. See also Wills, III. 2

This statute, which was founded on a former act, 9 G. 1. c. 29. also extends to the case of lunatics acting by their committee. § 11 of this act, in conformity with former laws, provides for the surrendering of copyhold lands by attorneys, for the purpose of suffering re-

The general custom of copyholds allows a copyholder to make a lease for one year of his copyhold estate, and no more, without incurring a forfeiture: but a copyholder may make a lease for one year, and covenant with the lessee, that, after the end of that year, he shall have the same for another year, and so from year to year during the space of seven years, &c., and be no forfeiture. Cro. Jac. 300. For this does not amount to a lease, but is only a covenant, subjecting the covenanter to an action for damages. Though a copyholder may not make a lease to hold for one year, and so from year to year during his life, excepting one day yearly, &c., which will be a forfei-ture, being a mere invasion. But a licence to lease may be had. A woman who was a copyholder in fee married, her husband made a lease for years, not warranted by the custom, which was a forfeiture; the husband died; and see 4 Rep. 21-25. &c.

Livery upon any conveyance of a copyhold estate amounts to a forfeiture. And yet if a copyholder for life surrender to another in fee, this is no forfeiture; for it passeth by the surrender to the lord, and not by livery.

If copyholder for life cut down timber-trees, it is a forfeiture of his copyhold: though such copyholder may take house-bote, hedge-bote, and plough-bote, upon his copyhold, of common right, as a thing incident to the grant; if he be not restrained by custom, to take them by the assignment of the lord or his bailiff. Where a copyholder for life fells timber-trees, the lord may take them, and the estate is for-feited; but if under-lessee for years of a copyholder cut down timber, this shall not be a forfeiture of the copyhold estate, but the lord is put to his action on the case against the lessee. 1 Bulst. 150: Style, 233. A copyhold granted to two for their lives successively, where the custom of the manor is, that they shall not fell trees; if the first copyholder for life cut down trees, &c., it is not only a forfeiture of his own estate for life, but of him in remainder. Moor, 49.

In other cases, a copyholder for life, committing waste, shall not forfeit the estate of him in remainder. Cro. Eliz. 880. If copyholder for life, where the remainder is over for life, commits a forfeiture by waste, &c., he in remainder shall not enter, but the lord. 2 Danv. 198. A copyholder committing waste voluntarily, or permissive, this is a forfeiture: voluntary, as if he pull down any house, though built by himself; lop trees, and fell them, plough up meadows, whereby the ground is made worse, &c. Permissive, if he suffer the roof of the house to let in rain, or the house to fall; or if he permit his meadow-ground to be surrounded with water, so that it becomes marshy, or his arable land to be thus surrounded, and become unprofitable, &c.; these and the like are forfeitures. See 2 Danv. Abr. 192, 193. 196, &c.: 1 Nels. Abr. 509, 510, &c. Although the property in the mines be in the lord, yet the copyholder has a sufficient possession to maintain trespass against one who breaks and enters the subsoil, though no trespass is committed on the surface. Lewis v. Branthwaite, 2 B. & Adol. 437.

If a feme copyholder for life takes husband, who commits waste and dies, the estate of the feme is forfeited; though not if a stranger commit the waste without the assent of the husband. 4 Rep. 37. Sed qu. the difference between the copyholder for life and copyholder in fee, in this respect; unless waste is distinguished from other forfeitures?

Most forfeitures are caused by acts contrary to the tenure: but a succeeding lord of a manor shall not have any advantage of a forfeiture by waste done by a copyholder in the time of his predecessor. 2. The lord may enter for waste committed by a copyholder for life, though there be an intermediate estate in remainder between the estate of copyholder for life and the lord's reversion. 2 Maul. & Selw. Rep. 68. The lord may have an injunction, and account of waste in equity. 3 Meriv. 673.

The Court of Chancery will sometimes relieve against a forfeiture for waste, and compel the lord to re-admit, on receiving satisfaction for the injury he has sustained. Such relief is particularly given where the waste is committed through ignorance, or where the waste is merely permissive, and there has not been an obstinate perseverance in neglecting to repair after notice. 1 C. C. 95: Pre. Ch. 568. Another instance in which relief against forfeiture for waste is said to be proper, is where the lesee of a copyholder commits waste without his direction or privity. Toth. 237. But in this latter case it may be doubted whether the waste is a forfeiture. See Mo. 49.

Also, when the estate is forfeited for nonpayment of rent, a fine, or such things, where a value may be set on them, and compensation made the lord on any laches of time, the tenant may be relieved: for there the land is but in nature of a security for those sums.

Preced. Chan. 569. 572.

A copyhold of inheritance is not forfeited by a conviction for felony without attainder, unless there is a special custom in the manor. 3 B. & Ald. 510. A pardon restores a copyholder who has committed felony to his competency to hold lands; and unless the lord has seized the copyhold, the copyholder may recover it on his pardon from a person who has ousted him. 5 Barn. & C. 584.

In case of making a least for years, without licence, and not warranted by custom, found to be forfeiture at law, equity has nothing to do with it, to give any remedy; it is like to a feoffment made, or fine levied by particular tenants, against which there can be no relief. Where copyhold lands are pur-Ibid. 574. chased in fee, in trust for an alien, the lands are not seizable by the king: nor is the trust forfeited to him; for if the lands were forfeited as purchased for such alien, then the lord of the manor would lose his fines and services, &c.: Hard. 436.

CORN. The laws relating to the importa-tion and exportation of corn have been heretofore very uncertain, fluctuating, intricate, time not being permitted without the royal licence, and being at other times encouraged by bounties; the importation being from time to time permitted or restrained by various acts, imposing duties and regulations; repealed, altered, and re-enacted on the spur of the occasion.

The following acts are at present in force on this subject:—By stat. 11 G. 2. c. 22. if any person use violence on another person to hinder him from buying or carrying corn to any sea-port town, to be transported, &c., he shall be imprisoned by two justices for not more than exceeding three months, and be publicly whipped, &c.; and committing a second offence, or destroying granaries or corn in any boat or vessel, to be adjudged a felon, and transported for seven years. By this act the hundred was made liable to damages not exceeding 100L; but this part of the act is repealed by 7 and 8 G. 4. c. 27. See tit. Hundred.

To preserve the markets of corn uninterrupted, it is enacted by 36 G. 3. c. 9. that persons hindering the buying of corn, or seizing it in its progress from place to place, shall be punished by imprisonment in the house of correction, § 1. Persons convicted of such offence a second time, and persons destroying storehouses or carrying corn away therefrom unlawfully, are punishable by seven year's transportation, § 2.

The intercourse of corn between Great Britain and Ireland was regulated by various acts after the Union. At length by stat. 36 G. 3. c. 97. the free interchange of every species of grain (the product of either country, 47 G. 3. c. 7.) was permitted between the countries without respect to the prices, and without any duties or bounties.

By stat. 54 G. 3. c. 69. to permit the exportation of corn, grain, meal, malt, and flour, from any part of the United Kingdom, without payment of duty or receiving of bounty, all duties and bounties on the exportation of corn are repealed; and it is enacted, that it shall be lawful for any person to export at all times from any port of the United Kingdom, any corn, &c., without the payment of any duty or customs thereon; and that no person shall be entitled to any bounty upon or in respect of the exportation of any corn, &c.

By stat. 9 G. 4. c. 60. corn, grain, meal, and flour, the growth and produce of any foreign country, or of any British possession out of Europe, is allowed to be imported into the United Kingdom for consumption, upon payment of certain duties, regulated from time to time, according to the average price of British corn made up and published in manner required by the act; to be collected as duties of customs under 6 G. 4. c. 111. (see tit. Customs), and monthly accounts of all corn imported and the duties paid are to be published by the commissioners of customs. The following tables show the amount of the duties on foreign wheat, &c.

CORNAGE, cornagium, from the Lat. cornu, a horn.] A kind of tenure in grand serjeanty; the service of which was to blow a horn when any invasion of the Scots was perceived: and by this tenure many persons held their lands Northward, about the wall commonly called the Picts' Wall. Cambd. Britan. 609. This old service of horn-blowing was afterwards paid in money, and the sheriffs accounted for CORN-RENTS. By stat. 18 Eliz. § 6. on college leases, one third of the old rent shall be reserved in wheat or malt, &c., the invention of Lord Treasurer Burleigh, and Sir Thomas Smith, who observed the value of money to sink much, and the price of provisions to rise greatly, on our communications with the Indies: and therefore devised this method for upholding the revenues of the colleges. 2 Com. 322.

CORNWALL. A royal duchy, the revenues of which belong to the Prince of Wales. for the time being, abounding with mines, and having stannary courts, &c. It yields a great revenue, and is held by a particular tenure. Several acts have been from time to time passed for regulating the granting of leases, &c. See 21 Jac. 1. c. 29: 1 Car. 1. c. 2. CORODY, corodium.] Signifies a sum of money, or allowance of meat, drink, and clothing due to the king from an abbey, or other house of religion, whereof he was founder, towards the sustentation of such a one of his servants as he thought fit to bestow it upon. The difference between a corody and a pension seems to be, that a corody was allowed towards the maintenance of any of the king's servants in an abbey: a pension is given to one of the king's chaplains, for his better maintenance, till he may be provided of a benefice. And as to both these, see Fitz. Nat. Br. fol. 250. where are set down all the corodies and pensions that our abbeys when they were standing were obliged to pay to the Corody is ancient in our laws: and it is mentioned in Staundf. Prærog. 44. And by the stat. of Westm. 2. c. 25. it is ordained that an assize shall lie for a corody. It is also apparent by stat. 34 and 35 H. 8. c. 26. that corodies belonged sometimes to bishops, and noblemen, from monasteries: and in the New Terms of Law, it is said that a corody may be due to a common person, by grant from one to another; or of common right to him that is a founder of a religious house, not holden in Frankalmoigne; for that tenure was a discharge of all corodies in itself: by this book it likewise appears, that a corody is either certain or uncertain, and may not be only for life or years, but in fee. Terms de la Ley. 2 Inst. 630. See the Monasticon Anglicanum for the form of a grant of corody.

CORONARE FILIUM. To make one's son a priest. Anciently lords of manors, whose tenants held by villenage, did prohibit them coronare filibs, lest such lords should lose a villein by their entering into holy orders: for ordination changed their condition, and gave them liberty, to the prejudice of the lord, who could before claim them as his natives or born servants. Homo Coronatus was one who had received the first tonsure, as preparatory to superior orders; and the tonsure was in form of a corona, or crown of thorns. Cowel.

CORONER, CORONATOR, à Corona.] An ancient officer at the common law. is made of him in King Athelstan's charter to Beverley, anno 905.

He is called Coroner, Coronator-because he hath principally to do with pleas of the crown, or such wherein the king is more immediately concerned. 2 Inst. 31: 4 Inst. 271. And in this light the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench is the principal coroner in the kingdom, and may (if he pleases) exercise the jurisdiction of a coroner in any part of the realm. 4 Rep. 57. But there are also particular coroners for every county of England; usually four, but sometimes six, and sometimes fewer. F. N. B. 163. This office is of equal antiquity with that of sheriff, and was ordained together with him to keep the peace, when the earls gave up the wardship of the county. Mirror, c. 1. § 3.

I. His Election and Removal.

II. 1. His Power and Duty; 2. His Fees for the Execution of his Duty; 3. His Punishment for the Breach of it; and 4. His Removal.

I. His Election and Removal.—HE IS STILL CHOSEN by all the freeholders in the countycourt; as, by the policy of our ancient laws, the sheriff and conservators of the peace, and all other officers were who were concerned in matters that affected the liberty of the people; 2 Inst. 558; and as verderors of the forests still are, whose business it is to stand between the prerogative and the subject in the execution of the forest laws. For this purpose there is a writ at common law de coronatore eligendo, F. N. B. 163. in which it is expressly commanded the sheriff, " quod talem eligi faciat, qui melius et sciat, et velit, et possit, officio illi intendere." See post. And in order to effect this the more surely, it was enacted by stat. Westm. 1. 3 Ed. 1. c. 10. that none but lawful and discreet knights should be chosen; and there was an instance in the 5 Edward III. of a man being removed from this office because he was only a merchant. 2 Inst. 32. But it seems it is now sufficient if a man hath | be defrayed by the candidates.

the statutum de militibus, 1 Ed. II. were lands to the amount of 201. per annum;) whether he be really knighted or not. F. N. B. 163, 4. For the coroner ought to have an estate sufficient to maintain the dignity of his office, and answer any fines that may be set upon him for his misbehaviour. 1bid. And if he hath not enough to answer, his fine shall be levied on the county, as the punishment for electing an insufficient officer. Mirror, c. 1. § 3. 2 Inst. 175. Now, indeed, through the culpable neglect of gentlemen of property, this office has been suffered to fall into disrepute, and get into low and indigent hands; so that although formerly no coroners would condescend to be paid for serving their country, and they were by the aforesaid stat. Westm. 1. expressly forbidden to take a reward, under pain of great forfeiture to the king; yet for many years past they have only desired to be chosen for the sake of their perquisites: being allowed fees for their attendance. See post, II. 2.

By stat. 28 Ed. 3. c. 6. it is enacted "That all coroners of the counties shall be chosen in the full counties of the most meet and lawful people that shall be found in the same counties, to execute the said office: saved always to the king and other lords, who ought to make such coroners their seignories and franchises."

The oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, are to be taken, and then the oaths of office: when the coroner is elected, and sworn into his office, he is to remember the qualification acts, and in due time, to take the sacrament and oaths of abjuration. Impey's

The coroner should also within six months after his election make and subscribe the declaration required by the stat. 9 G. 4. c. 17. § 2. 5. which may be done either in the Court of Chancery or King's Bench, or at the quarter sessions of the county.

Some doubts and difficulties which existed as to the election of coroners (England and Wales), are obviated by stat. 58 G. 3. c. 95. by which it is enacted that the sheriff shall hold his county-court for the election of coroners, at the usual place of election, at the county-court next after receipt of the writ de coronatore eligendo, (or within fourteen days after, if the court falls within six days of the receipt of the writ, or upon the same day, giving ten days' notice. That if the election is not determined on view, a poll shall be taken, which shall be determined within ten days. That the voters (if required) shall swear that they are bona fide freeholders (but the amount of the freehold is not specified). That mortgagors or cestui que trusts shall vote (unless the mortgagee or trustee be in actual possession, who may then vote). That freeholds shall not be split by conveyance for creating votes: and that the expences of the poll shall

Where a sheriff having received the writ! for the election of a coroner more than six days before the next county court, did not at that court proceed to the election, but there gave notice that the election would take place at a court to be holden by adjournment fourteen days after, held (by the Lord Chancellor and the Justices of K. B. & C. P.) that the election at such adjourned court was void, as not being in conformity with the writ. 58 G. 3.2. Russ. 475.

The coroner is chosen for life: and his office does not determine by death of the king, 3 Salk. 100. but may be removed by either being made sheriff, or chosen verderor, which are offices incompatible with the other; or by the king's writ de coronatore exonerando, for a cause to be therein assigned: as that he is engaged in other business, is incapacitated by years, or sickness, hath not a sufficient estate in the county, or lives in an inconvenient part of it. F. N. B. 163, 4. See post. And by stat. 25 G. 2. c. 29. extortion, neglect, or misbehaviour, are also made causes of removal. See post, II. 3.

There are special coroners, within divers liberties, as well as the ordinary officers in every county: as the Coroner of the Verge, which is a certain compass about the king's court; who is likewise called Coroner of the King's Household. Cromp. Juris. 102.

The king's coroner shall execute his office within the verge. Stat. 32. 8. c. 10. § 7. Some corporations and colleges are licensed by charter to appoint their coroners within their own precincts. 4 Inst. 271. For what arises on the high sea, we read of coroners appointed by the king or his admiral. 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 53. See post, Coroner of the King's Household.

It is said coroners are of three kinds. 1. By virtue of an office. 2. By charter or commission. 3. By election.

1. The Chief Justice of K. B.—2. The Lord Mayor of London is by charter 18 Edward IV. Coroner of London. See post .-The Bishop of Ely also hath power to make coroners, by a charter of Henry VII.: and there are coroners of particular lords of franchises and liberties, who by charter have power to create their own coroners, or to be coroners themselves, especially in the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, as well as that of the verge above referred to .- 3. The general coroners of counties.—See 1 Hale, 52: 4 Rep. 57:

The coroner of Portsmouth has jurisdiction on board a man of war lying in Portsmouth harbour, on view of the body of a man who had hanged himself on board such vessel; for though the Admiralty have a coroner of their own, he never takes inquisitions of felo de se. Stra. 1097: Andr. 231.

in the county where generally elected. Their authority is judicial and ministerial. cial where one comes to a violent death, and to take and enter appeals of murder, pronounce judgment upon outlawries, &c. And to inquire of lands and goods, and escapes of murderers, treasuretrove, wreck of the sea, deodands, &c. The ministerial power is where the coroners execute the king's writs, on exception to the sheriff, as by his being party to a suit, kin to either of the parties, on default of the sheriff, &c. 4 Inst. 271: 1 Plowd. 73. And the authority of coroners does not determine by the demise of the king. 2 Inst.

Where coroners are empowered to act as judges, as in taking an inquisition of death, or receiving an appeal of felony, &c., the act of one of them is of the same force as if they had all joined; but after one of them has proceeded to act, the act of another of them will be void: and where they are authorised to act only ministerially, in the execution of a process directed to them upon the incapacity of the sheriff, their acts are void, if they do not all join. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 9. § 45: Hob. 70.

So that coroners as ministers must all join; but as judges, they may divide. But two coroners ought to be judges in redisseisin; and though one serves to pronounce an outlawry, the entry ought to be in the name of all of them: and so of all processes directed to the coroners. Staundf. 53: Jenk. Cent. 85.

If the sheriff is either plaintiff or defendant, or one of the cognisees, the writ must be directed to the coroner. Cro. Car. 300. the coroner is not the officer of B. R. but where the sheriff is improper; not where there is no sheriff; for if the sheriff die the coroner cannot execute a writ. In case of two coroners, if one is challenged, the other may execute the writ, &c., yet both make but one officer: it is the same with two sheriffs of a city, &c. 1 Salk. 144. A venire facias shall go to the coroner, where the sheriff is a party, or the defendant is a servant to the sheriff, &c. But it ought to be on a principal challenge to the favour. Moor, 470.

If there be two sheriffs, and the objection of interest applies to one only, the writ should be directed to the other and not to the coroner. 5 M. & S. 144: Jervis on Coroners, p.

On defaults of sheriffs, coroners are to impanel juries, and return issues on juries not appearing, &c. As the sheriff in his turn might inquire of all felonies by the common law, saving the death of a man; so the coroner can inquire of no felony but the death of a person, and that super visum corporis. 4 Inst. 271. But in Northumberland the coroner by custom may inquire of other felonies. 35 H. 6. 27. But without custom no coroner II. 1. or appeals as of inquests, &c.

Coroners, before the stat. Magna Charta, might not only receive accusations against offenders, but might try them: but since that statute, they cannot proceed so far: and appeals before them are removeable into B. R. &c. by certiorari, directed to the coroners and sheriffs, &c. Though process may be awarded by the sheriff and coroner, or the coroner only, in the county-court on appeals, till the exigent, &c. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 9. § 41.

By the stat. de officio coronatoris, 4 Ed. 1. st. 2. the coroner is to go to the place where any person is slain or suddenly dead, and shall by his warrant to the bailiffs, constables, &c., summon a jury out of the four or five neighbouring towns, to make inquiry upon view of the body; and the coroner and jury are to inquire into the manner of killing, and all circumstances that occasioned the party's death; who were present, whether the dead person was known, where he lay the night before, &c. Examine the body if there be any signs of strangling about the neck, or of cords about the members, &c. Also all wounds ought to be viewed and inquiry made with what weapons, &c. And the coroner may send his warrant for witnesses, and take their examination in writing: and if any appear guilty of the murder, he shall inquire what goods and lands he hath: and then the dead body is to be buried. A coroner may likewise commit the person to prison who is by his inquisition found guilty of the murder; and the witnesses are to be bound by recognizance to appear at the next assizes, &c.

When the jury have brought in their verdict, the coroner is to inroll and return the inquisition, whether it be brought in murder, manslaughter, &c., to the justices of the next gaol-delivery of the county, or certify it into B. R., where the murderers shall be proceeded against 2 Rol. Abr. 32. Upon an inquisition taken before the coroner, he must put into writing the effect of the evidence given to the jury before him; and bind them to appear, &c., which is to be certified to the court with the inquisition: and for neglecting it the coroner shall be fined. 1 and 2

P. M. c. 13: 1 Lib. Abr. 317.

By stat. 7 G. 4. c. 64. § 4. every coroner upon inquisition taken before him for manslaughter, murder, or for being accessary to murder before the fact, shall put the evidence in writing, and bind the witnesses by recognizance to appear at the next court of oyer and terminer, or gaol delivery, or superior criminal court of a county palatine or great sessions, and certify and subscribe the evidence, recognizances, and inquisition, and deliver the same to the proper officer of the court before the opening of the court: and

A coroner is not bound ex officio to take an inquisition, but must be sent for. 1 Salk. 377. The coroner has a discretion as to admitting or excluding persons from his court. If he acts corruptly or maliciously, he is liable to a criminal information; but as he is a judge of record an action does not lie against him for turning a person out of a room when he was about to make an inquisition. Garnett v. Ferrand, 6 Barn. & Cres. 611.

The words "suddenly dead," are not to be understood of a fever, apoplexy, &c., and ought not in such cases to intrude into private families; and death by a kick of a horse is not a case for an inquest: violent and unnatural deaths are what the law intends. See

The word Murdravit is not necessary in a coroner's inquisition of felo de se; though it is in an indictment for killing another person. 1 Salk. 377. It is not necessary that the inquisition be taken in the place where the body was viewed. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 9. § 25. But a coroner has no authority to take an inquisition of death, without a view of the body; and if the inquest be taken by him without such view, it is void. 2 Lev. 140.

See 3 Barn. & Ald. 260.

The coroner may in convenient time take up a dead body that hath been buried, in order to view it; but if it be buried so long that he can discover nothing from the viewing it, or if there be danger of infection, the inquest ought not to be taken by the coroner, but by justices of peace, by the testimony of witnesses; for none can take it on view but the coroner. Bro. Coron. 167. 173. If the body is buried, the town shall be amerced: and it shall be, if the body is suffered to lie so long that it sinks. 2 Danv. Abr. 209. &c. Where the body hath lain for some time, that it cannot be judged how it came by its death, that must be recorded; that at the coming of the justices of assize, the town where, &c. may be amerced on sight of the coroner's

A coroner may find any nuisance by which the death of a man happens: and the township shall be amerced on such finding. I Nels. Abr. 536. If one is slain in the day, and the murderer escapes, the town where done shall be amerced, and the coroner is to inquire thereof on view of the body. Stat. 3 Hen. 7. c. 1. A coroner may take an indictment upon view of the body; as also an appeal, within a year after the death of one slain. Wood's Inst. 491. But a coroner super visum corporis, cannot make an inquisition of an accessory after the murder; though he may of accessories before the fact. Moor, 29.

Coroners ought to sit and inquire on the body of every prisoner that dies in prison. They have no jurisdiction within the verge of the king's courts; nor of offences, committed at sea, or between high and law water mark when the tide is in; though they have in arms and creeks of the sea. 3 Inst. 134. See ante, I. ad finem.

Where a coroner's inquest is quashed, he must take a new one super visum corporis.

And a coroner may attend and amend his inquisition in matters of form: but if he misbehaves himself, and a melius inquirendum is granted upon it, that inquisition must be taken by the sheriffs or commissioners, upon affidavits, and not super visum corporis; because none but a coroner can take inquisition super visum, &c., and he is not to be trusted again. 1 Salk. 190: 2 Danv. Abr. 210. See 3 Barn. & A.260. A coroner's inquest was quashed for omitting to state the place where the death happened, or where the body was buried, and for omitting the names of the jurors on the body, and because they had subscribed with the initials only of their christian names. Rex v. Evett, 6 Barn. & C. 247.

A coroner's inquisition being final, the coroner ought to hear council and evidence on both sides. 2 Sid. 90. 101. The coroner must admit evidence, as well against the king's interests, as for it; but it hath been held, that if a person be killed by another, and it is certainly known that he did it, the coroner's jury are to hear the evidence only for the king, and inquire whether the killing were by malice or without malice, &c. Per Hale, C. J. Where a coroner would not admit of evidence against the king, to prove a felo de se to be non compos mentis, his inquisition was set aside: and a new inquisition taken, whereby it was found that the party was non compos. 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. 60. If there be an inquisition of manslaughter or murder, and also an indictment by the grand jury against one, and he is arraigned, and found Not Guilty on the indictment; here it is necessary to quash the coroner's inquisition, or to arraign the party upon it, and acquit him on that also: for otherwise it stands as a record against him, whereon he may possibly be outlawed. 2 Hale, 65. And where a person found guilty by the coroner's inquest, pleads, and is acquitted by the petit jury; they must give in who it was that killed the man, which serves as an indictment against that other person; and if they cannot tell who, they may mention some fictitious name. Ibid.

The court of K. B. granted a criminal information for publishing in a newspaper a statement of the evidence given before a coroner's jury, accompanied with comments; although the statement was correct, and it was not found that the party had any malicious motive in the publication. R. v. Fleet, 1 Barn. & A. 379.

It is a misdemeanor and indictable to bury a dead body, liable to the coroner's inquest, without sending for the coroner. 1 Salk. 377.

2. His Fees for the Execution of his Duty. By the stat. 3 Ed. 1. c. 10. coroners shall demand or take nothing for doing their office: and by the ancient law of England, none having any office concerning the administration of justice could take any fee for doing his office; and therefore this statute was only in affirmance of the common law. By stat. 3 H. 7. c. 1. upon an inquisition taken on view of the body, the coroner shall have 13s. 4d. fee of the goods of the murderer; and if he be gone, then out of the amercement of the town for the escape; though stat. I H. 8. c. 7. enacts, that where a person is slain by misadventure, the coroner is to take no fee, on pain of 40s. Justices of assize and of peace have power to inquire of and punish extortions of coroners, and also their defaults. Stat.

By the stat. 25 G. 2. c. 29. for every inquisition, not taken upon the view of a body dying in gaol, which shall be taken by any coroner in any township or place contributory to the rates directed by stat. 21 G. 2. c. 29. the sum of 20s., and for every mile which he shall travel from the place of his abode, the farther sum of 9d. shall be paid him out of the money arising by the said rates. And for every inquisition taken upon the view of a body dying in gaol, so much money not exceeding 20s. shall be paid him as the justices at the sessions shall think fit to allow, out of the money arising from the said rates. Provided that over and above the recompence by the statute appointed, the coroner who shall take an inquisition upon the view of a body slain or murdered, shall have the fee of 13s. 4d. payable by stat. 3 Hen. 7. c. 1. out of the goods of the slayer or murderer, or out of the amercements upon the township, if the slayer or murderer escape. Coroners taking farther fees guilty of extortion.

Provided that no coroner of the king's palaces, nor any coroner of the Admiralty, nor of the County Palatine of Durham, nor of the city of London and borough of Southwark, or of any of the franchises belonging to the said city, nor any coronor of any city, borough, town, liberty, or franchise, not contributary to the rates directed by stat. 12 G. 2. c. 29. or within which such rates have not been usually assessed, shall be entitled to any fee, recompence, or benefit given by this act.

Under this act a coroner is not entitled to any compensation for the miles travelled in returning from taking an inquisition. R. v. Oxfordshire Just. 2 Barn. &. A. 203. And if he holds two or more inquisitions at the same place he is only entitled to one sum of 9d. per mile for travelling expences. 5 Barn. & C. 430

The coroners of franchises that do not contribute to the county rate, are not entitled to the fees given by the stat. 25 G. 2. c. 29. nor to any fees to be paid by the county. 7 East's Rep. 52. A mandamus to the justices in session, to allow an item of charge in the which the coroner of the county cannot intercoroner's account, refused, because the justices were of opinion that under the circumstances there was no ground to suppose that the deceased had died any other than a natural, though a sudden death, and therefore that the inquisition had not been duly taken: and the Court of K. B. saw no reason for interfering with that judgment. 11 East's Rep.

By stat. 1 G. 4. c. 28. to regulate the fees payable to coroners in Ireland on attending inquisitions, grand juries are authorised to present five guineas for each inquest held, provided the whole amount do not exceed forty guineas at each assize.

3. His punishment for the Breach of it .- If a coroner be remiss in coming to do his office, when he is sent for, &c., he shall be amerced by virtue of the above mentioned statute De coronatoribus. S. P. C. 51: Salk. 377: H.

P. C. 170.

If a coroner hath been guilty of any corrupt practice, bribery, &c. in taking the inquisition, a melius inquirendum may be awarded for taking a new one by special commissioners, &c. Coroners concealing felonies, &c. are to be fined, and suffer one year's imprisonment. 3 Ed. 1. c. 9. Also for mismanagement in the coroner, the filing of the inquisition may be stopped. 1 Mod. 82. coroner's inquisition is not traversable: if it be found before the coroner super visum corporis, that one was felo de se, the executors or administrators of the deceased, it is said, cannot traverse it. 3 Inst. 55. But it has been held that the inquest, being moved into B. R. by certiorari, may be there traversed by the executor or administrator of the deceased. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 9. § 54. And it has been adjudged, that the inquisition of felo de se is traversable, though fugam fecit is not. 2 Leo. 152.

4. His Removal .- If a coroner be convicted of extortion, wilful neglect of duty, or misdemeanor in his office, the court before whom he shall be so convicted may adjudge that he shall be removed from his office. See stat. 25 G. 2. c. 29. And coroners may be removed by the writ de coronatore exonerando for any reasonable cause assigned in the writ, and new coroners be elected in their stead. writ is issued on petitition of the freeholders, and must state the grounds of objection to the coroner's continuance in his office, and should be verified by affidavit. The writ commands the sheriff to discharge the former coroner, on which the writ de coronatore eligendo issues. In practice both writs are issued together, but the writ de coronatore exonerando must be executed first. 1 Jac. & Walk. 454: Jervis on Coroners, 69.

But if murder be committed within the verge, and the king removes, before any indictment taken by the coroner of the king's household; the coroner of the county and the coroner of the king's house shall inquire of the same. If the same person be coroner of the county, and also of the king's house, an indictment of death taken before him as coroner, both of the king's house, and of the county, is good. 4 Rep. 46: 2 Inst. 134.

By the stat. 33 H. 8. c. 12. § 1. 3. it is ordained, that all inquisitions made upon the view of persons slain within any of the king's palaces or houses, or any other house or houses wherein his majesty shall happen to be abiding in his royal person, shall be taken by the coroner for the time being of the king's household, without any assistance of another coroner of any shire within this realm; by the oaths of twelve or more of the yeoman officers of the king's household, returned by the two clerks controllers, the clerks of the checks, and the clerks marshal, or one of them, of the said household, to whom the said coroner of the household shall direct his precept; and the said coroner shall certify under his seal, and the seals of such persons as shall be sworn before him, all such inquisitions before the master or lord steward of the household; who hath the appointment of such coroner, &c.

CORONER OF LONDON. By the charter of King Edward IV. the mayor and commonalty of London may grant the office of coroner to whom they please; and no other coroner but he that belongs to the city, shall have any power there. Also the lord mayor, &c. may choose two coronors in Southwark. When any one is killed, or comes to an untimely death in London, the coroner upon notice shall attend where the body is, and forthwith cause the beadles of the ward to summon a jury to make the necessary inquiry, how such person came by his death: and after inquisition taken he shall give a certificate to the church-warden, clerk, or sexton of the parish, to the intent the corpse may be buried. The coroner's fees here formerly amounted to 25s., now to above double that sum; unless the friends of the deceased are poor, and then he shall execute his office for nothing. Cit. Lib. 46, COLONATORE ELIGENDO. A writ which lies on the towns situated within his domaine, on the death or discharge of any coroner, directed to the sheriff out of the Chancery, to call together the freeholders of the county, for the choice of a new coroner; and to certify into the Chancery both the election and the name of the party elected, and also to give him his oath, &c. CORONATORE EXONERANDO. A writ for the discharge of a coroner, for negligence, or insufficiency in the discharge of his duty; and where coroners are so far engaged in any other public business, that they cannot attend the office, or if they are disabled by old age or disease to execute it, or have not sufficient lands, &c., they may be discharged by this writ. 2 Inst. 32: 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 9. § 12. But if any such writ be grounded on an untrue suggestion, the coroner may procure a commission from the Chancery to inquire thereof; and if the suggestion be disproved, the king may make a supersedeas to the sheriff, that he do not remove the coroner; or if he have removed him, that he suffer him to execute the office. Reg. Orig. 177, 178: F. N. B. 164. See tit. Coroner. As also the coroner's is an office of freehold, the Court of Chancery, with whom the power of granting this writ resides, will not suffer it to issue, unless on affidavit, that the defendant has been served with notice of the petition for it. 3 Atk. 184. And on an election of a new coroner by a majority of the freeholders, the power and authority of the old one is ipso facto extinguished. See tit. Coroner: and Jervis on Coroners.

CORONE, Fr.] All matters of the crown were heretofore reduced to this law head or title; they are the things that concern treason, felony, and divers other offences, by the common law, and by statute. Shep. Epit. 367.

CORPORAL OATH. And how it is administered. See tit. Oath.

CORPORATION, CORPORATIO.] A body politic or incorporate; so called as the persons composing it are made into a body, and of capacity to take and grant, &c. Or, it is an assembly and joining together of many into oue fellowship and brotherhood, whereof one is head and chief, and the rest are the body; and this head and body knit together make the corporation: also it is constituted of several members, like unto the natural body, and framed by fiction of law, to endure in perpetual succession.

With respect to corporations, or communities of old, the forming of cities into communities, corporations, or bodies politic, and granting them the privilege of municipal jurisdiction, contributed more than any other cause to introduce regular government, police, and arts, and to diffuse them over Europe. Louis the Gross, in France, to counterbalance called charters of community, and formed the inhabitants into corporations, or bodies politic, to be governed by a council and magistrates of their own nomination. About the same period the great cities in Germany began to acquire like immunities; and the practice quickly spread over Europe, and was adopted in Spain, England, Scotland, and all the other feudal kingdoms. Robertson's Hist. Emp. C. V. 1 v. 32. 34. &c.

Of corporations some are sole, some aggregate: sole, when in one single person, as the king, a bishop, dean, &c. Aggregate, which is the most usual, consisting of many persons, as mayor and commonalty, dean and chapter, &c. Likewise corporations are spiritual or temporal; spiritual, of bishops, deans, archdeacons, parsons, vicars, &c. Temporal, of mayors, commonalty, bailiffs and burgesses, &c. Some corporations are of a mixed nature, composed of spiritual and temporal persons, such as heads of colleges and hospitals, &c. All corporations are said so be ecclesiastical, or lay.

Lay corporations are of two sorts, civil and eleemosynary. The civil are such as are erected for a variety of temporal purposes. The king, for instance, is made a corporation to prevent in general the possibility of an interregnum, or vacancy of the throne, and to preserve the possessions of the crown entire; for immediately upon the demise of one king, his successor is in full possession of the regal rights and dignity. Other lay corporations are erected for the good government of a town or particular district, as a mayor and commonalty, bailiff and burgesses, or the like: some for the advancement and regulation of manufactures and commerce; as the trading companies of London and other towns: and some for the better carrying on of divers special purposes, as churchwardens, for conservation of the goods of the parish; the College of Physicians, and company of Surgeons in London, for the improvement of the medical science; the Royal Society for the advancement of natural knowledge; and the Society of Antiquaries, for promoting the study of antiquities. And among these general corporate bodies, the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge must be ranked. 3 Burr. 1650.

The eleemosynary sort are, such as are constituted for the perpetual distribution of the free alms, or bounty, of the founder of them to such persons as he has directed. Of this kind are all hospitals for the maintenance of the poor, sick, and impotent: and all colleges, both in our Universities, and out of them. Such as at Westminster, Eton, Winchester, &c., which colleges are founded for two purposes. 1. For the promotion of piety and learning, by proper regulations and ordinances. 2. For imparting assistance to the members of those bodies, in order to enable them to prosecute their devotion and studies with his potent vassals, conferred new privileges greater ease and assiduity. And all these eleemosynary corporations are, strictly speak. I tion, it shall be intended that it did originally ing, lay and not ecclesiastical, even though composed of ecclesiastical persons, and although they in some things partake of the nature, privileges, and restrictions of ecclesiastical bodies. 1 Ld. Raym. 6. They are, in fact, lay corporations, because they are not subject to the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, or to the visitations of the ordinary or dioccsan in their spiritual characters. 1 Comm. 471.

V. How they are dissolved.

I. How Corporations are created.—Bodies Politic or incorporate may commence and be established three manner of ways, viz. by prescription, by letters patent, or by act of parliament; but most commonly begin by patent, or charter. 1 Inst. 250: 3 Inst. 202:

3 Rep. 73.

In making aggregate corporations, there must be, 1. Lawful authority. 2. Proper persons to be incorporated. 3. A name of incorporation. 4. A place, without which no corporation can be made. 5. Words sufficient in law to make a corporation. 10 Rep. 29. 123: 3 Rep. 73. The words incorpora, funda, &c., are not of necessity to be used in making corporations; but other words equivalent are sufficient; and of ancient time, the inhabitants of a town were incorporated, when the king granted to them to have Guildam Mercatoriam. 2 Danv. Abr. 214. He that gave the first possessions to the corporation is the The parishioners or townsmen of a parish or town, and tenants of a manor, are to some purposes a corporation. Co. Lit. 95.

If the king grants lands to the inhabitants of B., their heirs and successors, rendering a rent, for any thing touching these lands, this is a corporation, though not to other purposes: but if the king grants lands to the inhabitants of B., and they be not incorporated before, if no rent be reserved to the king, the grant is void. 2 Danv. 214. If the king grants to the men of Islington to be discharged of toll, this is a good corporation to this intent: but not to purchase, &c. And by special words the king may make a limited corporation, or a corporation for a special purpose. Ibid.

A corporation may be created by implication from the provisions of an act of parliament, though there are no express words creating it. Thus, where it appeared from the act that certain conservators of a river were to take lands by succession, and not by inheritance, they were held a corporation by implication. 10 Barn. & C. 349: 2 B. & Adol.

London is a corporation by prescription: but though a corporation may be by prescripderive its authority by grant from the king; for the king is the head of the commonwealth, and all the commonwealth in respect of him, is but one corporation; and all other corporations are but limbs of the greater body. 1 Lil. Abr. 330. A mayor and commonalty, or corporation, cannot make another corporation or commonalty. 1 Sid. 290. The city of London cannot make a corporation, because that can only be created by the crown; but London, or any other corporation, may make a fraternity. 1 Salk. 193.

The parliament by its absolute and transcendant authority, may perform this, or any other act whatsoever: and actually did perform it to a great extent, by stat. 39 Eliz. c. 5., which incorporated all hospitals and houses of correction founded by charitable persons, without farther trouble: and the same has been done in other cases of charitable foundations. But otherwise it has not formerly been usual thus to intrench upon the prerogative of the crown; and the king may prevent it when he pleases. And, in the particular instance before mentioned, it was done, as Sir Edward Coke observes, 2 Inst. 722. to avoid the charges of incorporation and licences of mortmain in small benefactions; which in his days were grown so great, that they discouraged many men from undertaking these pious and charitable works.

Where the words of a charter are doubtful, they may be explained by contemporaneous usage. 3 T. R. 271. 288. n.

The constitution of a corporation, as settled by act of parliament, cannot be varied by the acceptance of any charter inconsistent with 6 T. R. 268.

A charter cannot be partially accepted, whether a charter of creation, or one granted to an existing corporation. 4 Barn. & C. 781. A college is not bound to accept an accession to its foundation. 1 Jac. R. 391.

The king (it is said) may grant to a subject the power of erecting corporations. (Bro. Abr. tit. Prerog. 53: Viner, Prerog. 88. pl. 16; though the contrary was formerly held. Year Book, 2 H. 7. 13.); that is, he may permit the subject to name the persons and powers of the corporation at his pleasure; but it is really the king that erects, and the subject is but the instrument; for though none but the king can make a corporation, yet qui facit per alium, facit per se. 10 Rep. 33. this manner the chancellor of the University of Oxford has power by charter to erect corporations; and has actually often exerted it, in the erection of several matriculated companies, now subsisting, of tradesmen subservient to the students.

When a corporation is erected, a name must be given to it; and by that name alone it must sue and be sued, and do all legal acts, though a very minute variation therein is not material. 10 Rep. 122. A foreign corporation may sue in this country by its corpora-

The name of incorporation, says Sir Edward Coke, is as a proper name, or name of baptism; and therefore when a private founder gives his college or hospital a name, he does it only as a godfather; and by that same name the king bap-tizes the corporation. 10 Rep. 28.

A non-description of a corporation in a conveyance of part of their estates for the redemption of the land tax was held immaterial. 6 Taunt. 467: and see 7 Taunt. 546.

And it may change its name, as corporations frequently do in new charters, and will still retain its former rights and privileges.

II. Their Interest and Jurisdiction .-When a corporation is duly created, all incidents, as to purchase and grant, sue and be sued; 2 B. & Adol. 840; &c. are tacitly annexed to it; and although no power to make laws, statutes, or ordinances, is given by a special clause to a corporation, it is included by law in the very act of incorporating. Co. Lit. 264. A new charter doth not merge or extinguish any of the ancient privileges of the old charter. And if an ancient corporation is incorporated by a new name, yet their new body shall enjoy all the privileges that the old corporation had. Raym. 439: 4 Rep. 37.

There are usually granted in charters to corporations, divers franchises; as felons' goods waifs, estrays, treasure-trove, deodands, courts, and cognizance of pleas, fairs, markets, assize of bread and beer, &c. 4 Rep. 65. Actions arising in corporations may be tried in the corporation courts; but if they try actions which arise not within their jurisdictions, and encroach upon the common law, they shall be punished for it. Lutw. 1571, 1572. Actions triable there must, in general, mean those actions wherein the corporation is not interested.

There may be a corporation without a head; but where there is a head, all acts ought to be by and to the head; nor can they sue without such head; and if he dies, no-

Terms de la Ley.

Though a sole corporation cannot generally take in succession goods and chattels, &c., yet it may take a fee simple in succession, by the words successors. Co. Lit. 8, 9. 46. Aggregate corporations may take not only goods and chattels, but lands in fee-simple. without the word successors, for the reason before-mentioned. 4 Inst. 249. Succession in a body politic is an inheritance in a body private. If a lease for years be made to a bishop and his successors, it is said his executors shall have it in auter droit; for regularly no chattel can go in succession in case of a sole corporation, no more than if a lease be made to a man and his heirs, it can go to this heirs. Co. Lit. 46.

Grants of corporations are to be by deed, under their common seal, and are good without delivery, for the common seal gives perfection to corporation deeds. Dav. 44.

But though the affixing of the common seal to the deed of conveyance of a corporation be sufficient to pass the estate without a formal delivery, if done with that intent, yet it has no such effect if the order for affixing the seal be accompanied by a direction to their clerk, to retain the conveyance till accounts were adjusted with the purchaser. 9 East's Rep. 360.

Co. Lit. 31.

The corporation of the city of London is to answer for all particular misdemeanors, which are committed in any of the courts of justice within the city; and for all other general misdemeanors committed within the city; so it is conceived of all other corporations. 1 Lil. Abr. 329. If a common officer of a town doth any thing for their common use, it is reasonable the corporate town should be answerable for it. 1 Leon. 215.

The stat. 32 G. 3. c. 58. § 4. does not bind an officer of a corporation, having custody of the records, to permit any member of the corporation to inspect the order for the admission and swearing in of the freemen, &c. of the corporation; and therefore where the townclerk offered to permit an inspection of the entries made upon stamps, of the admission and swearing in of burgesses, but refused an inspection of the common council book, in which it was usual to enter the order for the admission and swearing in of the burgesses, the Court of K. B. held that he did not thereby incur a pen-Davies v. Humphreys, 3 Maule & S. alty.

By 2 and 3 W. 4. c. 69. no municipal corporation or any officer thereof, shall apply any money, stock, securities, &c. of the corporation in discharge or satisfaction of any expences incident to the election of any member of parliament, or of any candidate. § 3. All conveyances of any lands, &c. of the corporation for such purpose to be void. corporation officers and others applying money, &c. contrary to the act, shall be liable to make good the amount. § 7. Members of corporations concurring in any such application, &c. shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

III. How far their Acts are binding .-- A corporation is properly an investing the people of the place with the local government thereof, and therefore their laws shall be binding to strangers; but a fraternity is some people of a place united together in respect of a mystery and business into a company, and their laws and ordinances cannot bind strangers, for they have not a local power. Salk. 193.

No masters and wardens, &c. of any mystery, or other corporation, shall make any byclaws or ordinances in diminution of the king's prerogative, or against the common profit of the people; except the same be approved by the Lord Chancellor, or chief justices, &c. on pain of 40l. And such bodies corporate shall not make any acts or ordinances for the restraining persons to sue in the king's courts for remedy, &c. under the like penalty. Stat. 19 H. 7. c. 7. Ordinances made by corporations, to be observed on pain of imprisonment, or of forfeiture of goods, &c. are contrary to Magna Charter. 2 Inst. 47. 54.

But penalties may be inflicted by bye-laws, which may be recovered by distress or action of debt: and a custom for the Lord Mayor and aldermen of London to commit a citizen for not accepting of the livery, &c. was held a good custom, being for the good government of the city. 5 Mod. 320.

Corporations may not, by bond, or otherwise, restrain any apprentice, &c. from keeping a shop in the corporation, under the penalty of 40l. Stat. 28 H. 8. c. 5. See tit. Bye-laws.

In acts done by corporations, the consent of the major part shall be binding. Stat. 33 H.

This act clearly vacates all private statutes, both prior and subsequent to its date, which require the concurrence of more than a majority to give validity to any grant or election. Blackstone (1 Comm. 478.) is of opinion, that it has not affected the negative given by the statutes to the head of any society; but it seems that this opinion may be questioned; especially in cases where, in the first instance, he gives his vote with the members of the society. It is the usual language of college statutes to direct that many acts shall be done by guardianus et major pars sociorum, or magister, or propositus et major pars; and it has been determined by the Court of King's Bench (Cowp. 377.) and by the visitor of Clare Hall, Cambridge, and also by the visitors of Dublin College, that this expression does not confer upon the warden, master, or provost, any negative; but that his vote must be counted with the rest, and he is concluded by a majority of votes against him.

IV. How they are visited.—Corporations being composed of individuals subject to human frailties, are liable, as well as private persons, to deviate from the end of their institution. And for that reason the law has provided proper persons to visit, inquire into, and correct all irregularities that arise in such corporations, cither sole or aggregate, and whether ecclesiastical, civil, or eleemosynary. With regard to all ecclesiastical corporations, the ordinary is their visitor, so constituted by the canon law, and from thence derived to us. The pope formerly, and now the king, as supreme ordinary, is the visitor of the archbishop or metropolitan; the metropolitan has the charge and coercion of all suffragan bishops: in ecclesiastical matters, the visitors of all deans and chapters, of all parsons and vicars, and of all other spiritual corporations. With respect to all lay corporations, the founder, his heirs, or assigns, are the visitors, whether the foundation be civil or eleemosynary; for in a lay incorporation, the ordinary neither can, nor ought to visit. 10 Rep. 31.

The founder of all corporations in the strictest and original sense is the king alone, for he only can incorporate a society; and in civil incorporations, such as mayor and commonalty, &c., where there are no possessions or endowments given to the body, there is no other founder but the king; but in eleemosynary foundations, such as colleges and hospitals, where there is an endowment of lands, the law distinguishes and makes two species of foundation; the one fundatio incipiens, or the incorporation, in which sense the king is the general founder of all colleges and hospitals; the other fundatio perficiens, or the dotation of it, in which sense the first gift of the revenues is the foundation, and he who gives them is in law the founder: and it is in this last sense that we generally call a man the founder of a college or hospital. 10 Rep. 33. But here the king has his prerogative; for, if the king and a private man join in endowing an eleemosynary foundation, the king alone shall be the founder of it. And in general the king being the sole founder of all civil corporations, and the endower, the perficient founder of all eleemosynary ones, the right of visitation of the former results, according the rule laid down, to the king; and of the latter to the patron or endower.

The king being thus constituted by law visitor of all civil corporations, the law has also appointed the place wherein he shall exercise this jurisdiction; which is the Court of King's Bench; where, and where only, all misbehaviours of this kind of corporations are inquired into and redressed, and all their controversies decided. However, though the Court of King's Bench, upon a proper complaint and application, can prevent and punish injustice in civil corporations, as in every other part of their jurisdiction; it is not the language of the profession to call that part of their authority a visitatorial power. 1 Comm. 481. n.

As to eleemosynary corporations, by the dotation, the founder and his heirs are of common right the legal visitors; but if the founder has appointed and assigned any other person to be visitor, then his assignee so appointed is invested with all the founder's power, in exclusion of his heir. Eleemosynary corporations are chiefly hospitals, or colleges in the Universities; these were all of them considered by the popish clergy as of mere ecclesiastical jurisdiction: however, the law of the land judged otherwise; and, with regard to hospitals, it has long been held (Y. B. 8 Ed. 3. 28: Ass. 29.) that if the hospital be spiritual, the bishop shall visit; but if lay, the patron. This and the bishops in their several dioceses are right of lay patrons was indeed abridged by stat. 2 H. 5. c. 1. which ordained that the or-dinary should visit all hospitals founded by subjects; though the king's right was reserved to visit by his commissioners such as were of royal foundation. But the subject's right was in part restored by stat. 14 Eliz. c. 5. which directs the bishop to visit such hospitals only, where no visitor is appointed by the founder thereof: and all hospitals founded by virtue of the stat. 89 Eliz. c. 5. are to be visited by such persons as shall be nominated by the respective founders. But still, if the founder appoints nobody, the bishop of the diocese must visit. 2 Inst. 575.

Colleges in the Universities (whatever the common law may now, or might formerly judge) were certainly considered by the popish clergy, under whose direction they were, as ecclesiastical, or at least as clerical corporations; and therefore the right of the visitation was claimed by the ordinary of the diocese. This is evident, because in many of our most ancient colleges, where the founder had a mind to subject them to a visitor of his own nomination, he obtained for that purpose a papal bull, to exempt them from the jurisdiction of the ordinary; several of which are still preserved in the archives of the respective societies. And in some of our colleges, where no special visitor is appointed, the bishop of that diocese in which Oxford was formerly comprised, has immemorially exercised visitatorial authority (that is, the Bishop of Lincoln, from whose diocese that of Oxford was taken); which can be ascribed to nothing else but his supposed title as ordinary to visit this, among other ecclesiastical foundations.

But, whatever might be formerly the opinion of the clergy, it is now held as established common law, that colleges are lay corporations, though sometimes totally composed of ecclesiastical persons; and that the right of visitation does not arise from any principles of the canon law, but of necessity was created by the common law. Ld. Raym. 8. And yet the power and jurisdiction of visitors in colleges was left so much in the dark at common law, that the whole doctrine was very unsettled till the famous case of Philips v. Bury. Ld. Raym. 5: 4 Mod. 106. In this the main question was, whether the sentence of the Bishop of Exeter who, (as visitor) had deprived Doctor Bury, the rector of Exeter College, could be examined and redressed by the Court of King's Bench. And the three puisne judges were of opinion, that it might be reviewed, for that the visitor's jurisdiction could not exclude the common law; and accordingly judgment was given in that court. But Lord Chief Justice Holt was of a contrary opinion; and held that by the common law the office of visitor is to judge according to the statutes of the college, and to expel and deprive upon just occasions, and to hear all appeals of course: and that from him, and him only, the party grieved ought to have redress: the founder having reposed in him so entire a the law doth annex a condition to every such confidence that he will administer justice im- grant, that if the corporation be dissolved, the partially, that his determinations are final, and examinable in no other court whatever. And, upon this a writ of error being brought into the House of Lords, they concurred in Sir John Holt's opinion, and reversed the judgment of the Court of King's Bench. To which leading case all subsequent determinations have been conformable. But, where the visitor is under a temporary disability, there the Court of Kings Bench will interpose to prevent a defect of justice. Stra. 797. Also it is said (2 Lutw. 1556.) that if a founder of an eleemosynary foundation appoints a visitor, and limits his jurisdiction by rules and statutes, if the visitor in his sentence exceeds those rules, an action lies against him; but it is otherwise where he mistakes in a thing within his power.

No particular form of words are necessary for the appointment of a visitor. Sit visitator, or visitationem commendamus, will create a general visitor, and confer all the authority incidental to the office; 1 Burr. 199; but this general power may be restrained and qualified, or the visitor may be directed by the statutes to do particular acts, in which instance he has no discretion as visitor; as where the statutes direct the visitor to appoint one of two persons, nominated by the fellows, to be the master of a college, the Court of King's Bench will examine the nomination of the fellows, and, if correct, will compel the visitor to appoint one of the two. 2 Term Rep. 290. New ingrafted fellowships, if no statutes are given by the founders of them, must follow the original foundation, are subject to the same discipline and judicature. Burr. 203. It is the duty of the visitor, in every instance, to effectuate the intention of the founder, as far as he can collect it from the statutes, and the nature of the institution; and in the exercise of this jurisdiction he is free from all control. Lord Mansfield has declared, that the visitatorial power, if properly exercised, without expence or delay, is useful and convenient to colleges; and it is now settled and established that the jurisdiction of a visitor is summary, and without appeal from it. 1 Burr. 200. See 1 Comm. 479. &c.

V. How they are dissolved.—A corporation may be dissolved, for it is created upon a trust; and if that be broken it is forfeited. 4 Mod. 58.

Corporations are dissolved by forfeiture of their charter, misuser, &c. upon the writ quo warranto brought: by surrender, or by act of parliament: and if they neglect to choose officers, or make false elections, &c. it is a forfeiture of the corporation. 4 Rep. 77.

Corporations may be dissolved in several ways, which dissolution is the civil death of the corporation; and in this case their lands and tenements shall revert to the person, or his heirs, who granted them to the corporation; for '

grantor shall have the lands again, because the cause of the grant faileth. Co. Lit. 13. The grant is indeed only during the life of the corporation, which may endure for ever: but, when that life is determined by the dissolution of the body politic, the grantor takes it back by reversion, as in the case of any other grant for life. The debts of a corporation, either to or from it, are totally extinguished by its dissolution; so that the members thereof cannot recover, or be charged with them, in their natural capacities. 1 Lev. 237.

A corporation may be dissolved. 1. By act of parliament; which is boundless in its operations. 2. By the natural death of all its members, in case of an aggregate corporation. 3. By surrender of its franchises into the hands of the king, which is a kind of suicide.

4. By forfeiture of its charter, through negligence or abuse of its franchise; in which case the law judges that the body politic has broken the condition upon which it was incorporated, and therefore the incorporation is void. And the regular course is to bring an information in nature of a writ of quo warranto, to inquire by what warrant the members now exercise their corporative power, having forfeited it by such and such proceedings. The exertion of this act of law, for the purposes of the state, in the reign of King Charles and King James the Second, particularly by seizing the charter of the City of London, gave great and just offence, though perhaps, in strictness of law, the proceedings in most of them were sufficiently regular: but the judgment against that of London was reversed by act of parliament, stat. 2 W. & M. c. 8. after the revolution. And by the same statute it is enacted, that the franchises of the City of London shall never more be forfeited for any cause whatsoever. And because by the common law corporations were dissolved, in case the mayor or head officer was not duly elected on the day appointed in the charter, or established by prescription, it is now provided by stat. 11 G. 1. c. 4. that no corporation shall be dissolved, for any default to choose a mayor, &c., but the electors are still to proceed to election; and if no election be made, the Court of King's Bench shall issue a mandamus requiring the electors to choose such mayor, &c. See Rex v. Mayor of Norwich, 1 B. & Adol. 316.

The proclamation of Jac. II. in the 4th year of his reign, for restoring corporations to their ancient charters, &c., operates (when accepted) as a grant of revival to such of the old corporations as had surrendered their corporate franchises to Car. II. (but which surrenders were not enrolled) who had granted new charters, and overturns such new charters. 3 T. R. 139.

When an integral part of a corporation is gone, and the corporation has no power to restore it, or to do any corporate act, the corporation is so far dissolved, that the crown may grant a new charter. 3 T. R. 199: and see 3 East, 213.

By stat. 2 Anne, c. 20. where persons intrude into the office of mayor, &c., of a corporation, a quo warranto shall be brought against the usurpers, who shall be ousted, and fined: and none are to execute an office in a corporation for more than a year. See farther on this subject Kyd's Treatise on the Law of Corporations;—and see also particularly this Diet. tits. Mortmain, Mandamus, Quo Warranto.

To prevent improper conduct in trading corporations in elections, and in disposing of the joint stock, it is by stat. 7 G. 3. c. 48. enacted, that no member of such corporations shall be admitted to vote in the general courts, until he shall have been six months in possession of the stock necessary to qualify him, unless it comes to him by bequest, marriage, succession, or settlement. And by the same statute, only one half yearly dividend is to be made by one general court, five months at least from the preceding declaration of a dividend; and questions for increasing the dividend are to be decided by ballot. See tit.

East India Company.

To facilitate the proceedings in cases of mandamus and quo warranto, and to prevent any undue advantage on either side, the stat. 12 G. 3. c. 21. provides that where any person shall be entitled to be admitted a freeman, &c. of any corporation, &c., and shall apply to the proper officer to be admitted, and shall give notice of his intention to move the Court of King's Bench for a mandamus, in case of refusal, the officer shall pay all the costs of the application. And the same statute enacts, that the proper officer shall, on the demand of two freemen, permit them and their agents to inspect the entries of admission of freemen, and to take copies and extracts, under penalty of 100l.

A bill has just been introduced into the House of Commons by Lord John Russell for the regulation of municipal corporations in England and Wales, which is intended to extend to 183 cities and towns, omitting only a few corporations of trifling importance. The following is a short outline of the provisions of the bill, some of which will, in all probability, undergo considerable alterations before they pass into a law.

The bill is entitled "A Bill to provide for the Regulation of Municipal Corporations in England and Wales." It recites, that divers bodies corporate at sundry times have been constituted within the cities, towns, and boroughs of England and Wales, to the intent that the same might for ever be and remain well and quietly governed; but that, partly by defects in the charters by which the said bodies corporate have been constituted, partly by neglect and abuse of the privileges by such charters granted and confirmed to the inhabitants of the said cities, towns, and horoughs, and partly by change of circumstances since the said charters were granted, the bodies corporate, for the most part, have not of long time been and are not now useful and efficient instruments of local government; and first it enacts the repeal of all acts, charters, and customs inconsistent with the bill. The bill commences with the usual interpretation clause, defining the construction of certain terms. It then provides as follows:—

1. That after the first election of councillors, the body corporate shall take and bear the name of "the mayor and burgesses of" (city and borough), and be constituted a corporation.-2. That the boundaries of certain cities and boroughs, in certain sections of schedules (A.) and (B.) of the bill, shall be the boundaries settled by the Parliamentary Boundary Act, 2 and 3 W. 4. c. 64; and that the boundaries of certain other sections in the said schedule shall be settled by the King in council, determined by a commission-That the municipal constituency shall be occupiers of houses, warehouses, counting houses, or shops, rated for three years to the relief of the poor of the borough, and who have paid all rates due for six months before the revision, and who shall be entitled to be burgesses, excluding all who, within twelve months of registration, shall have received parochial relief, or other alms, or any person or charitable allowance from any fund entrusted to the charitable trustees of such borough thereinafter mentioned; and that all occupiers whose landlords are rated or rateable to the poor may claim to be rated, as in the English Reform Bill; and any person coming to inhabit after the rate for the current year is made, may claim to be put upon it.-4. The burgesses who cease to be occupiers within the borough, or neglect to pay their rates, shall be omitted from the burgess roll; but within two years, may be restored at the next revision of the burgess roll: and that after the passing of the act no person shall be elected, admitted, or enrolled a citizen, freeman, liveryman, or burgess, or by any name, a member of any body corporate, in respect of any right or title other than that of being a settled rate-payer within such borough, according to the meaning and provisions of the bill .- 5. That burgesses shall not have individual benefit from common lands and public stock, &c., who were not entitled thereunto before the passing of the act.-6. That all exclusive rights of trading shall be abolished. -7. That overseers make out alphabetical lists of persons entitled to vote by certain forms; that persons omitted in the lists may give notice of claim, and lists of claimants and persons objected to, to be published; power to the mayor to revise the lists, and, upon due proof, to insert and expunge names, with certain powers to rectify mistakes in the lists; publication of the lists provided for as in the Reform Bill, and all expenses of regis-borough fund .-- 8. That a mayor and town | municipal purposes; all corporate property council be chosen in every borough; the mayor to be elected by the council; the councillors to be chosen by the burgesses on the 25th day of October next; one-third of the council to go out of office annually; any ex-councillor to be capable of re-election.—9. The larger class of towns (those with a population of 25,000) to be divided into wards: the mode of voting to be by ticket or voting paper, containing the christian names and surnames of the persons for whom each burgess votes, with their respective places of abode and description, signed by the burgess; all elections to be concluded in one day, and polling booths in the discretion of the mayor; no inquiry of the voter, except as to his identity, and whether he has voted before at the same election; the register to be final.-10. All existing mayors and aldermen, and councils, to go out of office, on election of new councils under the act.-11. Mayor to be annually elected by the council.-12. No qualification for mayor, council, or other municipal officers, other than that of burgess; fines for refusal of office; any public officer becoming bankrupt, or declared insolvent, to vacate office.—13. The mayor to be a justice of the peace for the borough and for the county, and to act as a returning officer at elections of members to serve in parliament during the term of his said mayoralty.—14. Power to the town council to appoint town clerk, treasurer, and other officers: to take security for due discharge of their official duties, and to determine salaries.—15. Treasurers to pay no money but by order in writing of a quorum of the town conneil, countersigned by town clerk, with summary powers against officers for not accounting.—16. Town councils of cities and towns which are counties, to name a sheriff; and in certain boroughs to appoint a coroner.—17. Town clerks and officers removed under the provisions of the act, to receive compensation, if they can agree, the same with the town councils: in case of non-agreement, the Lords of the Treasury to determine amount.—18. Town councils to nominate sub-committees.—19. All licenses of publicans and victuallers to be granted by town councils.—20. Town councils to appoint charitable trustees to administer all charity funds vested in municipal corporations; such trustees to appoint a secretary and treasurer. -21. Town councils to be trustees of all acts of which corporators are ex officio trustees.-22. A police committee to consist of mayor and councilmen; such committee to appoint constables for the borough; constables to be for the county as well as borough; powers of constables defined.—23. Borough magistrates to appoint annually a certain number of persons to act as special constables, in case of need to be called out on warrant of magistrates when they shall deem ordinary police insufficient.—24. Limited powers of rate for and all fines to be received on account of borough fund.-25. Power of bye-laws vested in the town-council.-26. Burgesses annually to choose two auditors (not to be members of council, nor to be town clerk, treasurer, or charitable trustee,) and mayor to choose a third; the three, half-yearly, to examine and audit borough accounts; all accounts to be annually published.—27. Town councils of certain boroughs to nominate persons for a commission of justices of the peace, such commission to be confirmed by the crown; and any town councils petitioning for stipendiary magistrates, the crown to appoint such. -28. Recorders (barristers-at-law of five years' standing) to be appointed by the crown in certain boroughs, if town councils petition for quarter sessions: with powers to such recorders to act for more than one borough. Recorder not to be councillor or police magistrate; recorder to be sole judge; in his absence, the mayor, &c .- 29. All capital jurisdictions abolished, and criminal jurisdiction limited to that of quarter sessions.—30. County justices of the peace to have jurisdiction in all boroughs which have not a separate court of sessions of the peace under the act, with provisions as to county rates, and appointment of the expenses of prosecutions at the assizes and county quarter sessions.-31. Civil jurisdiction extended in some boroughs, and generally regulated .- 32. Burgesses to be jurors.-33. Fees regulated, and tables to be

CORPSE, stealing of. If any one in taking up a dead body, steals the shroud, or other apparel, it will be felony. 3 Inst. 110: 12 Rep. 113: 1 Hal. P. C. 515. But stealing the corpse itself, only, is not felony, but it is punishable as a misdemeanour by indictment at common law. 2 Comm. 236: Russ. & Ry. 367.

CORPUS CHRISTI DAY. A feast instituted in the year 1264, in honour of the blessed sacrament; to which also a college in Oxford is dedicated. It is mentioned in the stat.

32 H. 8. c. 21.

CORPUS CUM CAUSA. A writ issuing out of the Chancery, to remove both the body and record, touching the cause of any man lying in execution upon a judgment for debt, into the King's Bench, &c., there to lie till he have satisfied the judgment. F. N. B. 251. See tit. Habeas Corpus.

CORRECTOR OF THE STAPLE, A clerk belonging to the staple to write and record the bargains of merchants there made.

CORREDIUM, CONREDIUM. The same with corrodium. See Corody.

CORRUPTION OF BLOOD, corruptio sanguinis.] An infection growing to the state of a man, and to his issue; and is where a person is attainted of treason or felony, by means whereof his blood is said to be corrupted, and neither his children, nor any of his blood can be heirs to him, or any other ancestor; also if he is of the nobility or a gentleman, he and all his posterity by the attainder are rendered base and ignoble; but by pardon of the king, the children born afterwards may inherit the land of their ancestor, purchased at the time of the pardon, or after; but so cannot they who were born before the pardon. Terms de la Ley.

If a man that hath land in right of his wife hath issue, and his blood is corrupt by attainder of felony, and the king pardons him; in this case, if the wife dies before him, he shall not be tenant by the courtesy, for the corruption of the blood of that issue; though it is otherwise, if he hath issue after the pardon; for then he should be tenant by the courtesy, although the issue which he had before the pardon be not inheritable. 13

H. 7. c. 17.

A son attainted of treason or felony in the life of his ancestor, obtains the king's pardon before the death of his ancestor, he shall not be heir to the said ancestor, but the land shall rather escheat to the lord of the fee by the corruption of blood. 36 Ass. Pl. 32 H. 8.

If the father of a person attainted die seised of an estate of inheritance, during his life no younger brother can be heir; for the elder brother, though attainted, is still a brother, and no other can be heir to his father, while he is alive; but if he die before the father, the younger brother shall be heir. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 49. § 49. See farther Co. Lit. 8. 391:

Dyer, 482: 3 Inst. 211.

Corruption of blood from an attainder is so high that it cannot be absolutely salved but by act of parliament: for the king's pardon doth not restore the blood so as to make the person attainted capable either of inheriting others, or being inherited himself by any one born before the pardon. 1 Inst. 391, 392: 2 Hawk. - A statute which saves the corruption of blood, impliedly saves the descent of the land to the heir; and it prevents the corruption of blood so far: also it saves the wife's dower, &c. But nevertheless the land shall be forfeited for the life of the offender. 3 Inst. 47: 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 41. § 5. By stat. 54 G. 3. c. 145. it is enacted that no future attainder for felony, except in cases of high treason, petit treason, or murder, or of abetting, procuring, or counselling the same, shall extend to the disinheriting of any heir, nor to prejudice of the right or title of any person, other than the right or title of the offender during his natural life only: and that it shall be lawful to every person to whom the right or interest of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, after the death of any such offender, should or might have appertained if no such attainder had been to enter into the same. See farther tits. Attainder, Forfeiture, Escheat, Tenure, &c.

CORSELET, Fr. in Lat. corpusculum.]
A little body. The name of an ancient armour used to cover the body or trunk of a man: wherewith pikemen commonly set in the front and flanks of the battle were formerly armed for the better resistance of the assaults of the enemy, and the surer guard of the soldiers placed behind, who were more slightly armed for their speedier advancing to, and retreating from the attack. 4 and 5 P. & M. c. 2.

CORSEPRESENT, from the Fr. corps present.] A mortuary: and the reason why it was thus termed seems to be, that where a mortuary became due on the death of any man, the best or second best beast was, according to custom, offered or presented to the priest, and carried with the corps. See stat. 21 H. 8. c. 6. and this Dict. tit. Mortuary.

Ordeal bread. It was a kind of superstitious trial used among the Saxons, to purge themselves of any accusation, by taking a piece of barley bread, and eating it with solemn oaths and execrations, that it might prove poison, or their last morsel, if what they asserted or denied were not punctually true. These pieces of bread were first execrated by the priest, and then offered to the suspected person, to be swallowed by way of purgation: for they believed a person if guilty, could not swallow a morsel so accursed; or if he did, it would choke him.

The form was thus: We beseech thee, O Lord, that he who is guilty of this theft, when the exorcised bread is offered to him in order to discover the truth, that his jaws may be shut, his throat so narrow that he may not swallow, and that he may cast it out of his mouth, and not eat it. Du Cange: The old form, or exorcismus panis hordeaci vel casei ad probationem veri, is extant in Lindenbrogius, page 107. And in the laws of King Canute, cap. 6. Si quis altari ministrantium accusetur, et amicis destitutus sit, cum sacramentales non habeat, vadat ad judicium, quod Anglice dicitur corsned, et fiat sicut Deus velit, nisi super sanctum corpus Domini permittatur ut se purget; from which it is conjectured, that corsned bread was originally the very sacramental bread, consecrated and devoted by the priest, and received with solemn adjuration and devout expectance that it would prove mortal to those who dared to swallow it with a lie in their mouths; till at length the bishops and clergy were afraid to prostitute the communion bread to such rash and conceited uses; when to indulge the people in their superstitious fancies, and idle customs, they allowed them to practise the same judicial rite, in eating some other morsels of bread, blessed or cursed to the like uses.

It is recorded of the perfidious Godwin, Earl of Kent, in the time of King Edward the Confessor, that on his abjuring the murder of the king's brother, by this way of trial, as a just judgment of his solemn perjury, the bread stuck in his throat, and cases, to the party succeeding against his adchoked him. Ingulph. This, with other barbarous ways of purgation, was by degrees abolished, though we have still some remembrance of this superstitious custom in our usual phrases of abjuration; as, I will take the sacrament upon it :- May this bread be my poison; -or, May this bit be my last, &c. See tit. Ordeal.

CORTIS, curtis.] A court or yard before

COSTS. EXPENSÆ LITIS.] In the prosecution and defence of actions, the parties are necessarily put to certain expences, or, as they are commonly called, Costs; consisting of money paid to the king and government for fines and stamp duties: to the officers of the courts; and to the counsel and attorneys for their fees, &c.

These costs may be considered either as between attorney and client; being what are payable in every case to the attorney, by his client, whether he ultimately succeed or not; or as between party and party, being those only which are allowed, in some particular versary. As between party and party, they are interlocutory or final; the former are given on various interlocutory motions and proceedings in the course of the suit. The latter (to which the term of costs is most generally applied, and the rules respecting which are of the most consequence) are not allowed till the conclusion of the suit.

COSTS, I.

Much of the following abstract of the law relating hereto is taken from Tidd's Practice. Chapter on Costs; a short and comprehensive abridgment; to which, and other productions on the subject, the practitioner must necessarily have recourse in nice and particular cases.

It will be sufficient for the present purpose to arrange the information on this subject in

I. In what general Cases Costs are given to the Plaintiff

II. In what to the Defendant.

III. Of double and treble Costs.

IV. Costs by particular Statutes.

V. Of taxing and recovering Costs. VI. In Criminal Prosecutions.

I. In what general Cases Costs are given to the Plaintiff.-No costs were recoverable by the plaintiff or defendant at common law. 2 Inst. 288: Hardr. 152. But by the stat. of Gloucester (6 Ed. 1.) c. 1. § 2. it is provided, "that the demandant may recover against the tenant the costs of his writ purchased (which, by a liberal interpretation, has been construed to extend to the whole costs of his suit; 2 Inst. 288.); together with the damages given by that statute, and that this act shall hold place in all cases where a man recovers dama. ges." This was the origin of costs de incremento. Gilb. Eq. Rep. 195. And hence the plaintiff has, generally speaking, a right to costs in all cases where he was entitled to damages, antecedent to, or by the provisions of the stat. of Gloucester (10 Co. 116. a.); as in assumpsit, covenant, debt on contract, case, trespass, replevin, ejectment, &c.; or where, by a subsequent statute, double or treble damages are given, in a case where single damages were before recoverable (10 Co. 116. a.: 2 Inst. 289. Cowp. 368,); as upon stat. 2 H. 4. c. 11. for suing in the Admiralty Court (10 Co. 116. a. b.: Dyer, 156. b.: Carth. 297.); upon stat. 8 H. 6. c. 9. for a forcible entry (10 Co. 115. b.: Co. Lit. 257. b.: Inst. 289: Cro. El. 582.); or upon stat. 2 and 3 W. & M. sess. 1. c. 5. for rescuing a distress for rent (Carth. 321: 1 Salk. 205: 1 Ld. Raym. 19: Skin. 555: Holt, 172. S. C.) And he hath also a right to costs in all cases where a certain penalty is given by statute to the party aggrieved (Cro. Car. 560: 1 Rol. Abr. 574: Skin. 363: Carth. 230: 1 Salk. 206: 1 Ld. Raym. 172: Say. Costs, 11: H. Black. 10.); for otherwise the remedy might prove inadequate. So where a right is vested by act of parliament in a particular person or corporaling the party to sue for it is an injury for which damages may be recovered, and then costs will follow. 9 Barn. & Cres. 524: 1 Cromp. & Jer. 56: see Tidd, 945. (9th ed.)

But the stat. of Gloucester did not extend to cases where no damages were recoverable at common law, as in scire facias, prohibition (Comb. 20.), &c. (but costs have been allowed on interlocutory proceedings in a writ of entry; 2 Bing. 387.); nor where double or treble damages were given by a subsequent statute, in a new case where single damages were not before recoverable; as in waste against tenant for life or years (2 H. 4. 17: 9 H. 6. 66. b.: 10 Co. 116. b.: 2 Inst. 289.); upon the stat. of Gloucester (6 Ed. 1. c. 5.);—for not setting out tithes (Moor, 915: Noy, 136: Hurdr. 152.), upon stat. 2 and 3 Ed. 6. c. 13; or for driving a distress out of the hundred (2 Inst. 289: Dyer, 177. but see Cro. Car. 560: 1 Rol. Abr. 574.), upon stat. 1 and 2 P. & M. c. 12. Nor does this statute extend to popular actions, where the whole or part of a penalty is given by statute to a common informer (1 Rol. Abr. 574: 1 Vent. 133: Carth. 231: 1 Salk. 206: 1 Ld. Raym. 172: Cas. Pr. C. B. 87: Barnes, 124. S. C.: Cowp. 366: 1 H. Black. 10: Bull. N. P. 333.); as upon stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4. § 31. for exercising a trade, without having served an apprenticeship; or upon the stat. of Usury, 12 Anne, st. 2. c. 16. In these and such like cases, therefore, the plaintiff is not entitled to costs, unless they are expressly given by the statute; but wherever they are so given, he is of course entitled to them.

Where single damages are given by a statute subsequent to the stat. of Gloucester, in a new case wherein no damages were previously recoverable, it has been doubted whether the plaintiff shall recover costs, if they are not mentioned in the statute. The rule in Pilford's case is, that he shall not (10 Co. 116. a.); and accordingly it is holden, that he is not entitled to costs in quare impedit (2 H. 4. 17: 27 H. 6. 10: 10 Co. 116. a.: 2 Inst. 289. 362: Barnes, 140: and see Cro. Car. 360: Carth. 231: Cowp. 367, 8.); wherein damages are given by the stat. of Westm. 2. (13 Ed. 1.) c. 5. § 3. But the rule in Pilford's case is contradicted by Lord Coke himself (2 Inst. 289.), who says, that "this clause (respecting the stat. of Gloucester's holding place, in all cases where a man recovers damages) doth extend to give costs, where damages are given to any demandant or plaintiff in any action by any statute made after this parliament." And the rule has been since narrowed by several modern decisions; from whence it may be collected, that the plaintiff is entitled to costs, in all cases where single damages are given by statute to the party grieved, although costs are not particularly mentioned in the statute. 2 Wils. 91: Barnes, 151. S. C.: 3 Burr. 1723: Term. Rep. 71: Tidd's Prac. 946 (9th ed.)

tion, the withholding the right and compel- grieved by an act since the stat. of Gloucester, he is entitled to costs if he succeed, though he had no remedy before such act. Rep. 268.

In several of the foregoing cases, wherein costs were not recoverable by the plaintiff at common law, they are expressly given him by stat. 8 and 9 W. 3. c. 11; by which it is enacted, that "in all actions of waste, and actions of debt upon the statute for not setting forth tithes, wherein the single value or damage found by the jury shall not exceed the sum of twenty nobles; and in all suits upon any writ or writs of scire facias, and suits upon prohibitions, the plaintiff obtaining judgment, or any award of execution, after pleaded or demurrer joined therein, shall likewise recover his costs of suit; and if the plaintiff shall become nonsuit, or suffer a discontinuance, or a verdict shall pass against him, the defendant shall recover his costs, and have execution for the same by capias ad satisfaciendum, fieri facias, or elegit."

This statute does not extend to a scire facias to repeal a patent, prosecuted in the name of the king. 7 Term Rep. 367. See Tidd, 947, (9th ed.) as to Costs in Scire Facias, Prohibition, Mandamus, Quo Warranto.

The plaintiff's general right to costs being thus settled and established upon the footing of the stat. of Gloucester, has been since altered, restrained and modified by several subse-

To prevent trifling and malicious actions for words, for assault and battery, and for trespass, it is enacted by stats. 43 Eliz. c. 6; 21 Jac. 1. c. 16; 22 and 23 Car. 2. c. 9. § 136. that where the jury who try any of these actions shall give less damages than 40s., the plaintiff shall be allowed no more costs than damages; unless the judge before whom the cause is tried shall certify, under his hand, on the back of the record, that an actual battery (and not an assault only) was proved, or that in trespass the freehold or title of the land came chiefly in question. Also by stats. 4 and 5 W. & M. c. 23; 8 and 9 W. 3. c. 11. if the trespass were committed in hunting or sporting by an inferior tradesman, or, if it appear to be wilfully and maliciously committed, the plaintiff shall have full costs; though his damages, as assessed by the jury, amount to less than 40s.

If, in an action on the case for an injury done to the plaintiff's right of common by digging turves there, the judge certify, under the stat. of Eliz. that the damages did not amount to 40s., the plaintiff shall have no more costs; for the interest or title of the land does not necessarily come in question in this action, and did not, in fact, in this case, where the action was brought against another commoner for a mere wrongful act. 8 East's Rep. 294. And the certificate may be granted in assault and battery, if no ac-Wherever an action is given to the party tual battery be proved. 1 New. R. 255; and see 2 New. R. 471. So in assault and battery, man and inhabitant of the city of London, with a separate count for a false imprisonment, where the verdict was for 1s. damages, and the judge certified under 43 Eliz., the Common Pleas refused to allow plaintiff his costs. 2 Bing. 333.

Where to trespass at A., and throwing down, burning, and totally destroying, the plaintiff's hedge there then erected, &c. whereby, &c. the defendant pleads the general issue, and justifies as to the throwing down the hedge, because it was erected on a common over which he prescribes for right of common, and issue is taken on such right, which is found for him, and a verdict for the plaintiff, for 20s. damages on the general issue; the facts stated in the special plea and found, cannot be taken into consideration to show that the title to the freehold could not come in question on the declaration; and as on the declaration the freehold might have come in issue, and the judge did not certify, the plaintiff is entitled to no more costs than damages. Stead v. Gamble, 7 East, 325.

If there be a certificate against any more costs than damages upon the stat. 43 Eliz. c. 6. § 2. the plaintiff shall not have the costs of the double pleas, on which all the issues were found for him; although the judge has not certified, under the stat. 4 Anne, c. 16. § 5. that the defendant had probable cause to plead the several special matters; that section only applying to cases where one at least of the special pleas is found for the defendant, which would entitle him to the general costs. Richmond v. Johnson, 7 East, 583.

The stat. 43 G. 3. c. 46. § 4. enacts that in all actions brought in England or Ireland, upon any judgment recovered, the plaintiff in such action shall not recover or be entitled to any costs of suit, unless the court in which action on the judgment shall be brought, or some judge of the same court shall otherwise order. But this statute does not extend to an action brought to recover the costs of a judgment of nonsuit. 14 East's Rep. 243. Tidd. 969.

The legislature has also been obliged to interfere still farther, to guard against trifling and vexatious actions by means of what are commonly called the Court of Conscience Acts. Such are stats. 3 Jac. 1. c. 15. § 14: 14 G. 2. c. 10; which provide that if an action be brought for less than 40s. against a defendant living in London, and liable to the jurisdiction of the Court of Requests there, the plaintiff shall not recover any costs, but shall pay them to the defendant.

The London Court of Requests has jurisdiction by the stat. 39 and 40 G. 3. c. 104. over a contract for the retention of tithes by the tenant, the value of which was under 51, and therefore if the vicar sue in the superior court for the same, and recover less than 51. upon a count in assumpsit, for a quantum valebant, the defendant may enter a suggestrading there at the time he was served with the writ, for the purpose of ousting the plaintiff of his costs under the twelfth section of the act. Sandby v. Miller, 5 East, 194.

Several other acts of parliament have been also made, establishing courts of conscience in various districts in and about the metropolis, as in the town and borough of Southwark, &c. by stat. 22 G. 2. c. 47 (but see 4 G. 4. c. 123. § 14. 16. and Tidd's Prac. 958. 9th ed.); in the city and liberty of Westminster, and part of the duchy of Lancaster, by stat. 23 G. 2. c. 27.) explained and amended by stat. 24 G. 2. c. 42), and in the Tower-hamlets, by stat. 23 G. 2. c. 30. And by stat. 23 G. 2. c. 33. the county court of Middlesex was put on a different footing, for the more easy and speedy recovery of small debts. See tits. County Courts, Courts of Conscience. And see Tidd's Chapter on Costs. (9th ed.)

When it was proved that a debt originally above was reduced below 40s. by part payment before the action brought, held that the defendant was entitled to costs under the statutes establishing courts of conscience in Southwark and London. 8 E. R. 28. 347. See 14 E. R. 344. S. P.: and also 8 E. R. 239: 1 Taunt. 60.

In general, where the act is not pleaded, the proper mode to obtain the costs is for the defendant to apply to the court, by affidavit, for leave to enter a suggestion on the roll of the facts necessary to entitle him to the benefit of the act suited to his case; which suggestion may be traversed or demurred to. farther, Tidd's Chapter on Costs. (9th ed.)

These statutes might perhaps have been with equal propriety classed under the 2d division of this title; but are introduced here as forming an exception to the general title of a plaintiff to costs in the cases already instanced.

The principal statute made for restraining the plaintiff's right to costs is stat. 22 and 23 Car. 2. c. 9. (extended to Wales and the Counties Palatine by stat. 12 and 13 W. 3. c. 9.); by which it is enacted, that "in all actions of trespass, assault, and battery, and other personal actions, wherein the judge, at the trial of the cause, shall not find and certify under his hand, upon the back of the record, that an assault and battery was sufficiently proved by the plaintiff against the defendant, or that the freehold or title of the land mentioned in the plaintiff's declaration was chiefly in question; the plaintiff, in case the jury shall find the damages to be under the value of forty shil. lings, shall not recover or obtain more costs of suit than the damages so found shall amount unto." It seems to have been the intention of this statute that the plaintiff shall have no more costs than damages, in any personal action whatsoever, if the damages be under 40s., except in cases of battery or freehold, and not even in these without a certificate. And tion on the roll, stating that he was a free- this construction was adopted in some of the prevailed; and it is now settled, that the statute is confined to actions of assault and battery, and actions for local trespasses, wherein it is possible for the judge to certify that the frechold or title of the land was chiefly in question. T. Raym. 487: T. Jun. 232: 2 Show. 258. S. C.: 3 Mod. 39: 1 Salk. 208: 1 Str. 577: Gilb. Eq. Rep. 195: Barnes, 131: 3 Wils. 322. S. C.: 1 H. Black. 294. Therefore it does not extend to actions of debt, covenant, assumpsit, trover (3 Keb. 31: 1 Salk. 208.), or the like; or to actions for a mere assault. 3 T. R. 391.); or for criminal conversation (3 Wils. 319); or battery of the plaintiff's servant (3 Keb. 184: 1 Salk. 208: 1 Stra. 192.), per quod consortium vel servitium amisit. In all these cases, though the damages be under 40s., the plaintiff is entitled to full costs without a certificate.

The certificate required by this statute need not, it seems, be granted at the trial of the cause; 11 Mod. 198; but may be granted within a reasonable time after the trial. 2 Barn. & Cres. 621: 4 Dow & Ry. 156. And where the defendant lets judgment go by default (Bull. N. P. 329.), or justifies the assault and battery, or pleads in such a manner as to bring the freehold or title of the land in question, on the face of the record (9 Prac. 314.), or a view is granted (1 Ld. Raym. 76: 2 Salk. 665.), a certificate is holden to be unnecessary: but it is necessary where, to a plea of a right of way, there is a replication of extra viam. Cochran v. Harrison, T. 22 G. 3. But where, in an action for an assault and battery, the defendant justifies the assault only (3 T. R. 391.), or an assault only is certified by the judge (2 Lev. 102.), the plaintiff recovering less than forty shillings is not entitled to more costs than damages; though in the latter case, to entitle him to full costs, the judge may certify, on stat. 8 and 9 W. 3. c. 11. that the assault was wilful and malicious. Wils. 326.

None of the statutes made for restraining the plaintiff's right to costs extends to actions brought in an inferior court, and removed by the defendant into a superior one. 2 Lev. 124: 4 Mod. 378, 9: 1 Ld. Raym. 395. But now, by 58 G. 3. in actions of assault and battery, commenced in courts having jurisdiction to 40s., if the jury give less than 49s. damages, the plaintiff shall have no more costs than damages. See Tidd's Prac. 967. (9th ed.) And it has been holden, that stat. 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. and stats 22 and 23 Car. 2. c. 9. only restrain the court from awarding more costs than damages; but the jury, not being restrained thereby, may give what costs they please.

It often happens that there are several counts or pleas, the issues upon which are some of them found for the plaintiff, and some for the defendant. The practice of the courts differed as to costs in such cases; but now, first cases that arose upon the statute. 3 Keb., by the rules of H. T. 1832, no costs shall be 121. 247. But a different construction soon allowed a plaintiff on any counts or issues on which he has not succeeded, and the costs of all issues for the defendant shall be deducted from the plaintiff's costs. See Tidd, 975.

(9th ed.) By the Welch Judicature Act, 5 G. 4. c. 106. in all actions upon the case for words, actions of debt, trespass on the case, assault and battery, or other personal action, and all transitory actions, which shall be brought in any of his majesty's courts of record out of the principality of Wales, and the debt or damage found by the jury shall not amount to the sum of 50l., and it shall appear upon the evidence that the cause of action arose in Wales, and that the said defendant was resident in Wales at the time of the service of any writ, or other mesne process, served on him, and it shall be so testified, under the hand of the judge who tried such cause, upon the record of Nisi Prius (on such facts being suggested on the record or judgment roll), a judgment of nonsuit shall be entered thereon against the plaintiff, who shall pay to the defendant costs of suit, and the defendant shall have like remedy to recover the same, as in the case of a verdict given for the defendant; and in the taxation of all costs allowed to the defendant, the proper officer shall allow to the plaintiff, out of the defendant's costs, the full sum given by the verdict to the plaintiff for his debt or damages; and, although no judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff upon such verdict, yet nevertheless such verdict, without any judgment entered thereon, shall be an effectual bar to any action commenced by the plaintiff for the same. Provided that nothing in this act contained shall preclude any person from commencing and carrying on any action, and which may be tried at the assizes at the nearest English county to that part of Wales in which the cause of action shall be laid to arise, against any defendant so resident in Wales, and obtaining full costs in such action, if the judge before whom the cause shall be tried shall certify, on the back of the record, that the title or freehold of land was chiefly in question, or that such cause was proper to be tried in such English county. See the Welch Judicature Act, 1 W. 4. c. 70. which repeals great part of this statute; but, as far as it relates to the plaintiff's being nonsuited, and paying costs to the defendant, in transitory actions brought in the courts at Westminster, where the cause of action arose in Wiles, and the defendant was resident there at the time of the writ being served, unless the judge certify on the record that the title or freehold of land was in question or that the cause was proper to be tried in an English county, not being expressly repealed by the 1 W. 4. c. 70. it may admit of doubt whether it is not still in force. See Tidd's Supplement to Prac. (9th ed.) p. 167. and and c. 30. § 41. in all actions for any thing | judgment be affirmed after verdict, the plaindone in pursuance of the acts for consolidating and amending the laws relative to larceny, &c., or malicious injuries to property, if a verdict shall pass for the defendant, or the plaintiff shall become nonsuit, or discontinue any such action after issue joined, or if, upon demurrer or otherwise, judgment shall be given against the plaintiff, the defendant shall recover his full costs, as between attorney and client, and have the like remedy for the same as any defendant hath by law in other cases; and although a verdict shall be given for the plaintiff in any such action, such plaintiff shall not have costs against the defendant, unless the judge before whom the trial shall be, shall certify his approbation of the action, and of the verdict obtained thereupon.

II. In what general cases Costs are given to the Defendant.-It has already been observed, that no costs were recoverable by a defendant at common law; and the reason seems to be, that if the plaintiff failed in his suit, he was amerced to the king pro falso clamore, which was thought to be a sufficient punishment, without subjecting him to the payment of costs. The first instance of costs being given to a defendant was in a writ of right of ward by the stat. of Malberge. (52 H. 3. c. 6.) Afterwards costs were given to the defendant in error by stat. 3 H. 7. c. 10; and in replevin by stat. 7 H. 8. c. 4. and stat. 21 H. 8. c. 19, &c. But in one of these cases the defendant is to be considered as an actor, and in the other of them the provision is virtually for the benefit of the plaintiff in the original action. Say. Costs, 70: Tidd's Prac. 976. (9th ed.)

In error brought by the defendant before execution (Cro. Jac. 636.), or by the plaintiff upon a judgment for the defendant, if the judgment be affirmed, the writ of error discontinued, or the plaintiff in error nonsuited, the defendant in error is entitled to costs, by stat. 3 H. 7. c. 10. and 8 and 9 W. 3. c. 11. § 2; upon the former of which statutes it has been holden, that costs are recoverable in error for the delay of execution, although none were recoverable in the original action. Dyer, 77: Cro. Eliz. 617. 659: 5 Co. 101. S. C.; Cro. Car. 145: 1 Str. 262: 2 Str. 1084. But see Cro. Car. 425: 1 Lev. 146: 1 Vent. 38. 166: 4 Mod. 245: Carth. 261. S. C. semb. contra.

An avowment in replevin for rent in arrear, for whom verdict and judgment are given below, which are affirmed on a writ of error, is not entitled to his costs on stat. 8 and 9 W. 3. which is confined to judgments for defendants on demurrer. 10 E. R. 2.

A writ of error having been quashed because brought by a feme covert without her husband, the defendant in error is entitled to costs under the stat. 4 Anne, c. 16. § 25:8 T. R. 302.

By stat. 13 Car. 2. st. 2. c. 2. § 10. if the tiff shall pay to the defendant in error his double costs. And by stat. 4 Anne, c. 16. § 25. for preventing vexation, from suing out defective writs of error, it is enacted, that " upon the quashing of any writ of error, for variance from the original record, or other defect, the defendant shall recover against the plaintiff in error his costs, as he should have had if the judgment had been affirmed, and to be recovered in the same manner." 2 Str. 834: Cas. temp. Hardw. 137. But none of the statutes before mentioned give costs upon the reversal of a judgment. I Stra. 617.

Where the plaintiff recovered a verdict at the trial, and had judgment in C. B., and, upon a bill of exceptions returned into B. R., judgment was reversed, and the plaintiff took nothing by his writ, the defendant could not have costs. Bell v. Potts, 5 East, 49.

When, upon setting aside a verdict for plaintiff, the costs are directed to abide the event, and then the plaintiff discontinues the action, the defendant is not entitled to the costs of the action. Howorth v. Samuel, 1 Barn. & Ald.

In replevin, or second deliverance, the defendant, making avowry, cognizance, or justification, for rents, customs, or services, or for damage feasant, is entitled to costs, by stat. 7 H. 8. c. 4. and stat. 21 H. 8. c. 19. § 3. if the avowry, cognizance, or justification be found for him, or the plaintiff be nonsuit, or otherwise barred: which statutes extend to avowries, &c., made by an executor (2 R. Rep. 437.); or for an estray (Cro. Eliz. 330.); and, as it should seem, for an amercement by a court leet (Cro. Jac. 520. sed vide Cro. 300.); but not to pleas of priscl en auter lieu, upon which the writ is abated (Com. Rep. 122.), or to pleas of property in the thing distrained. Hard, 153. By stat. 17 Car. 2. c. 7. § 2. the defendant obtaining judgment thereon for the arrearages of rent, or value of the goods distrained, is also entitled to his full costs of suit. And by stat. 11 G. 2. c. 19. § 22. if the defendant avow or make cognizance, according to that statute, upon a distress, for rent, relief, heriot or other service, and the plaintiff be nonsuit, discontinue his action, or have judgment against him, the defendant shall recover double costs of suits. But this latter statute does not extend to a seizure for a heriot custom.

At length costs were given to defendants by the stat. 23 H. 8. c. 15. § 1. "in trespass upon stat. 5 R. 2. debt, covenant, detinue, account trespass on the case, or upon any statute for an offence or wrong personal, immediately supposed to be done to the plaintiff," in cases nonsuit, or verdict for the defendant.

The stat. 13 Car. 2. st. 2. c. 2. § 10. giving double costs to the defendant in error, if judgment be affirmed after verdict, is confined to cases where the judgment so affirmed is for the plaintiff below, and not where the defendant below obtained judgment upon a special verdict. Baring v. Christie, 5 East, 545.

No costs are allowed on the stat. 3 H. 7. c. 10, where a writ of error is nonpressed before the transcript of the record by the clerk of the errors of B. R. 7 East, 3. 110.

The king, and any person suing to his use (stat. 24 H. 8. c. 8.), shall neither pay nor receive costs; for besides that he is not included under the general words of the statutes, as it is his prerogative not to pay them to a subject, so it is beneath his dignity to receive them. And it seems reasonable to suppose that the queen consort has the same privilege; for in actions brought by her she was not at the common law obliged to find pledges of prosecution, nor could be amerced in case there was judgment against her. F. N. B. 101: 1 Inst. 133. And on this principle of the king not paying or receiving costs, no costs are due on a certiorari removing summary proceedings, unless a recognizance be entered into at the time of removing the proceedings. 1 Term Rep. 82. Paupers (that is, such as will swear themselves not worth 5l.) are by stat. 11 H. 7. c. 12. to have original writs and subpænas gratis, and counsel and attorney assigned them without fee; and are excused from paying costs when plaintiffs, by the stat. 23 H. 8. c. 15. § 2. but shall suffer other punishments at the discretion of the judges. And it was formerly usual, on such paupers being nonsuited, to give them their election either to be whipped or pay the costs; though that practice is now disused. 1 Sid. 261: 7 Mod. 114: Salk. 506. And in cases of misconduct, or in certain other circumstances, they may be dispaupered; that is, deprived of their privilege of suing as paupers. It seems, however, agreed, that a pauper may recover costs, though he pays none; for the counsel and clerks are bound to give their labour to him, but not to his an-

Executors and administrators are not particularly excepted out of stat. 23 H. 8. c. 16; yet, as that statute only relates to contracts made with, or wrongs done to, the plaintiff (2 Stra. 1107.), it has been uniformly holden (Cro. Eliz. 503: Cro. Jac. 229: 2 Bulst. 261: ì Salk. 207. 313: 3 Burr. 1586: Say. Costs, 97.), that they are not liable to costs, upon a nonsuit or verdict, where they necessarily sue in their representative character, and cannot bring the action in their own right; as upon a contract entered into with the testator or intestate (T. Jon. 47: 2 Ld. Raym. 1414: 1 Str. 682. S. C.: Cas. Pr. C. B. 157: Pr. Reg. 118. S. C.: Barnes, 141.); or for a wrong done in his life-time. Barnes, 119. So where the plaintiff sucd an executor, and was nonsuited on evidence that the supposed testator was still alive, the court refused to allow costs to the defendant, it appearing to be still doubtful whether the testator was living or not. 1 Barn. & A. 286. And where a plaintiff sued as executor for a debt, which appeared claimable, if at all, as surviving parties of the deceased, and was nonsuited, the court refused "upon process issuing out of the Court of

to refer it to the master to tax the defendant's costs, it being doubtful whether justice would be done by such an order. 3 Barn. & A. 213. But where the cause of action arises after the death of the testator or intestate, and the plaintiff may sue thereon in his own right, he shall not be excused from the payment of costs, though he bring the action as executor or administrator; as upon a contract (6 Mod. 91. 181: 1 Salk. 207. S. C.: 1 Ld. Raym. 436: 1 Str. 682: Barnes, 119: 2 Str. 1106: 4 T. R. 277: 5 T. R. 234), express or implied; or in trover (Com. Rep. 162: Cas. Pr. C. B. 61: Barnes, 132: Cas. temp. Hardw. 204; but see 3 Lev. 60. semb. contra), for a conversion, after the death of the testator or intestate. 7 T. R. 358. An executor or administrator is liable to costs upon a judgment of non pros. Cas. Pr. C. B. 14. 157, 8: 3 Burr. 1585: 6 T. R. 654.

But they are not liable to costs on judgment, as in case of a nonsuit under 15 G. 2. c. 17. 2 H. B. 277. But where an executor adds some count as executor, stating a cause of action for which he might declare in his own right, if he is nonsuited, he shall be liable to costs. 2 Taunt. 116. And where he has knowingly brought a wrong action, or otherwise been guilty of a wilful default, he shall pay costs upon a discontinuance (Cas. Pr. C. B. 79: 3 Burr. 1451: 1 Blac. Rep. 451. S. C.), or for not proceeding to trial according to notice (Cas. Pr. C. B. 158: 3 Burr. 1585.); but otherwise he is not liable to costs in either of these cases. 2 Str. 871: Barnes, 133: 4 Burr. 1927. Nor, where he merely sues en auter droit, is he liable to costs upon a judgment, as in case of a nonsuit. 4 Burr.

Executors and administrators are liable to costs in error in cases where they would be liable in the original action. 1 H. B. 566.

No costs can be awarded on prohibition against executors, against whom judgment was obtained on demurrer, upon a question whether they were entitled to a general or limited probate. 3 E. R. 202.

Where plaintiff sued as executor, and was nonsuited, upon evidence at the trial that the supposed testator was still alive, the court refused to allow costs to the defendant; it appearing, by affidavits on both sides, to be still at least doubtful whether the supposed testator were living or not. Zachariah v. Page, 1 Barn. & Ald. 386.

Where an executrix pleaded, 1st. Non-assumpsit; and, 2d. Plene administravit; and issues on the first pleas were found for plaintiff, and on the last for the defendant; it was holden, that the last plea being a complete answer to the action, the defendant was entitled to the general costs of the trial. Edwards v. Bethel, 1 Barn. & A.

The stat. 23 H. 8. c. 15. only relates to cases where the plaintiff is nonsuited, or has a verdict against him. But by stat. 8 Eliz. c. 2. King's Bench, if the plaintiff do not declare in | fendant is entitled to costs under 8 Eliz. c. 2. three days after bail put in, or if after declaration he do not prosecute his suit with effect, but willingly suffer the same to be delayed or discontinued, or be non-suited therein, the judges, at their discretion, shall award to the defendant his costs, damages, and charges, in that behalf sustained." See Tidd, 981. (9th

The plaintiff, it has been observed, is not entitled to costs in a popular action, for the whole or part of a penalty given by statute to a common informer, unless they are expressly given him by the statute. Nor was the defendant entitled to costs in such an action until they were given by the stat. 18 Eliz. c. 5. § 3. made perpetual by stat. 27 Eliz. c. 10.

There being still many cases in which the defendant was not aided by the provisions of the before-mentioned statutes, the stat. 4 Jac. 1. c. 3. gives the defendant costs on a nonsuit or verdict in all cases where the plaintiff would have been entitled to them if he had obtained judgment.

When a defendant removes proceedings by a sc. fa. ro. from a county court into one of the superior courts, and signs judgment of non-pros. in default of plaintiff's appearing, he is entitled to costs under this statute. 1 T.R. 372.

The stats. 13 Car. 2. st. 2. c. 2. § 3; 8 and 9 W. 3. c. 11. § 2. gives costs to a defendant also in cases of non-pros. and demurrer; and the latter stat. § 1. gives costs to one of several defendants in trespass, assault, false imprisonment, or ejectment, acquitted, though the other defendants are convicted.

Though the defendant had judgment on demurrer in quare impedit, the Court of C. P. held that he was not entitled to costs under § 2. of the last mentioned statute. 1 H. B. 530.

When a feigned issue is ordered by a court of law, whether it be in a civil or criminal proceeding, the costs always follow the verdict, and must be paid to the party obtaining 1 Lil. P. R. 344: Barnes, 130: 1 Wils. 261. 331: Say. Rep. 24: 1 Wils. 324. But when a feigned issue is ordered by a court of equity, the costs do not follow the verdict, as a matter of course; but the finding of the jury is returned back to the court which ordered it, and the costs there are in the discretion of the court. Where the issue is ordered by a court of law, on a rule for an information (Say. Rep. 229: 1 Burr. 603.), or motion for an attachment (Say. Rep. 253.), the costs of the original rule or motion do not in general follow the verdict, but only the costs of the feigned issue, which costs are to be reckoned from the time when the feigned issue was first ordered and agreed to. 1 Burr. 604. Yet where it was ordered by the consent rule, that the costs should abide the event of the issue, the court directed the whole costs to be paid under it. 2 Burr. 1021: Tidd, 987. (9th ed.)

Where a plaintiff is put to declare in prohibition, and is nonsuited at the assizes, the defendant is only entitled to his single costs under the stat. 8 and 9 W. 3. c. 11. § 3. and not to double costs under 2 and 3 Ed. 6. c. 13. § 4: 15 E. R. 574.

By 43 G. 3. c. 46. § 3. where the defendant is arrested, and the plaintiff does not recover the amount of the sum for which the defendant is arrested, the defendant shall be entitled to costs of suit, provided it appears on affidavit that the plaintiff had not reasonable or probable cause for arresting the defendant for that amount. Where a verdict was taken subject to the award of an arbitrator, and the costs were to abide the event, and the arbitrator awarded a less sum than that for which the defendant was arrested, the court held the defendant entitled to costs. 3 B. & C. 491: 5 B. & A. 663: Tidd, 983. (9th ed.)

III. Of double and treble Costs .- Where the plaintiff recovers single damages he is only entitled to single costs, unless more be expressly given him by statute. But if double or treble damages be given by statute, in a case wherein single damages were before recoverable, the plaintiff is entitled to double or treble costs, although the statute be silent respecting them (Say. Costs. 228.); as in an action upon stat. 2 H. 4. c. 11. &c. Treble costs are recoverable in action on the case for treble damages against the sheriff, on 29 Eliz. c. 4. for extortion. 2 Barn. & Ald. 293: 1 Chitt. R. 137: see Tidd. 987. (9th ed.) In some cases double and treble costs are expressly given to the plaintiff; as upon the game laws, by stat. 2 G. 3. c. 19. § 5. And wherever a plaintiff is entitled to double or treble costs, the costs given by the court de incremento are to be doubled or trebled as well as those given by the jury. 2 Leon. 52: Cro. Eliz. 582: 3 Lev. 351: Carth. 297, 321: 2 Str. 1048. But see 1 Term Rep. 252. But double or treble costs are not to be understood to mean, according to their literal import, twice or thrice the amount of single costs. Where a statute gives double costs, they are calculated thus: 1. The common costs, and then half the common costs. If treble costs, 1. The common costs; 2. Half of these; and then half of the latter. See 4 Barn. & Cres. 889. 154: 6 Dow. & Ry. 1: 7 Dow. & Ry. 484.

Double or treble costs are also in some cases expressly given to the defendant; as in actions against parish officers, by stat. 43 Eliz. c. 2. § 19.—against justices of the peace, constables, &c. by stat. 7 Jac. 1. c. 5 .-- for distresses for rents and services, by stat. 11 G. 2. c. 19. § 21, 2.—and against officers of the excise or customs, by stat. 23 G. 3. c. 70. § 34: 6 G. 4. c. 108. § 97; and under the bankrupt act, 6 G. 4. c. 16. § 44: the jury act 6 G. 4. c. 50. § 58: the ejectment act, 1 G. 4. c. 87. § 6. In these, and such like cases, where it does not appear on the face of the record, that the defendant is entitled to the benefit of the act (as where he plet is the general issue), and there is no particular mode appointed for recovery of the costs, the proper mode after a nonsuit or verdict for the defendant, is to apply to the court, upon an affidavit of the facts, for leave to enter a suggestion on the roll. 1 Str. 49, 50: Cas. Pr. C. B. 16: Id. 138: 2 Str. 1021. S. C.: Say. Rep. 214: 3 Wils. 442: Cas. temp. Hardw. 125. But where a particular mode is appointed by statute, for the recovery of double or treble costs, as by the certificate of the judge who tried the cause, on stat. 7 Jac. 1. c. 5. there that particular mode must be observed (2 Vent. 45: Doug. 8vo. 307, 8: but see Doug. 8vo. 308. n.); so that if the judge certify, there is no need of a suggestion; and if he do not, it is useless, except where judgment goes by default. Cas. temp. Hardw. 138, 9.

IV. Costs by particular Statutes. A justice of the peace who has prosecuted a gaoler to conviction for suffering a prisoner to escape, committed by him on a charge of felony, is not entitled to the costs of the conviction under stat. 5 and 6 W. & M. c. 11. § 3. 2 T. R 47.

If a judge on the trial of an indictment for not repairing a road certify that the defence was frivolous, without also awarding costs in express terms under 13 G. 3. c. 78. the prosecutor is entitled to costs. 6 T. R. 344.

Justices of the peace may give costs in all cases of conviction, by stat. 18 G. 3. c. 19. 5

T. R. 356.

The prosecutor of a quo warranto information against a constable of Birmingham is not entitled to costs under stat. 9 Anne, c. 20. 5 T. R. 375.

Costs are due to the plaintiff who recovers treble damages in an action on 29 Eliz. c. 4. against the sheriff for taking more than the fee allowed by that statute on levying under an execution. 7 T. R. 267.

Persons dwelling near a steam engine which created a nuisance, and prosecuting an indictment for it, are parties grieved, entitled to their costs under 5 W. & M. c. 11. § 3. upon removal of the indictment by certiorari into K. B. by the defendants, and their conviction there. 16 E. R. 194.

The prosecutor of an indictment for obstructing an highway must show himself to be the party grieved in order to obtain costs.

To entitle an officer defendant to double costs under the stat. 7 Jac. 1. c. 5. there must be a certificate of the judge that the defendant was such an officer, and that the action was brought against him for something done by him in the execution of the office. 7 T. R. 443.

The above stat., and 21 Jac. 1. c. 12. § 3. ordere giving double costs to parish officers sued, day's &c., extends not to actions against them for party.

it does not appear on the face of the record, non-feasance, as for not paying over money, that the defendant is entitled to the benefit of &c. 3 E. R. 92.

When in an action against officers of excise for scizing goods, they do not tender amends before action brought, but pay money into court, and afterwards gain a verdict, they are entitled only to single costs under the stat. 23 G. 3. c. 70. § 31. 1 H. B. 344.

In trespass against the owner of a house adjoining to the plaintiff's in the metropolis, for taking down his party wall and building on it, the defendant showing at the trial that he was authorized in doing the thing complained of by the building act, 14 G. 3. c. 78. is entitled to treble costs upon a nonsuit. 9 E. R. 322.

A person sued on stat. 25 G. 3. c. 50. for shooting without a certificate, is not entitled to treble costs on obtaining a verdict. 1 T. R. 959

Full costs were allowed in an action on the stat. of Edward VI. for treble the value of tithes not set out, where there was a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to a reference, and the arbitrator directed a verdict to be entered for 30s. treble value. 2 Chitt. R. 155: and see 1 Bing. 182.

The statute 11 G. 2. c. 19. § 22. gives double costs against a plaintiff in replevin, only in three cases, viz. where he is nonsuit, discontinues his action, or has judgment given against him.—And therefore, where, in replevin, the cause not being then at issue, the parties agreed by bond to submit the question to arbitration, the costs to abide the event, the arbitrator afterwards awarded in favour of the defendant, it was held that he is not entitled to double costs under the statute. Gurney v. Buller, 1 Barn. § Ald. 670.

V. Of taxing and recovering Costs.—Costs are taxed, as between party and party, by the master in the King's Bench, or by one of the prothonotaries in the Common Pleas, upon a bill made out by the attorney for the party entitled; or frequently without a bill, upon a view of the proceedings: and if there have been any extra expences, which do not appear on the face of the proceedings, there should be an affidavit made of such expences, to warrant the allowance of them, which is called an affidavit of increased costs. Imp. K. B. 348. It was usual among fair practisers to give notice to the opposite attorney of the time when the costs are intended to be taxed. Id. 349. But in order to enforce it, there must be a rule to be present at taxing costs; which rule was obtained from the clerk of the rules in the King's Bench, or one of the secondaries in the Common Pleas, and should be duly served; after which, if the costs were taxed without notice, the taxation was irregular, and the attorney liable to an attachment. And now by rule of T. T. 1831, it is ordered, that before taxation of costs, one day's notice shall be given to the opposite

Where a party obtains leave by consent to laction for his wages against a foreigner, the examine witnesses abroad on depositions, he is not entitled to be allowed the expence of taking the depositions in the taxation of costs, though he succeed. 8 E. R. 393. Where a defendant obtains a mandamus to examine witnesses in India, the plaintiff having obtained a verdict, is entitled to the costs of cross-examination. 8 B. & C. 317.

The means of recovering costs, as between party and party, are by action or execution, upon a judgment obtained for them, or by attachment, upon a rule of court. Thus in ejectment, where there is a verdict and judgment against the tenant, an action may be brought, or execution taken out thereon, for the costs. Run. Eject. 140, 141. But where the plaintiff is nonsuited, for not confessing lease entry and ouster, the lessor of the plaintiff must proceed by attachment, upon the consent rule. Id. ibid.: 1 Salk. 259: Barnes, 182. And so where the nominal plaintiff is nonsuited upon the merits, or has a verdiet and judgment against him, the only remedy is by attachment against the lessor of the plaintiff. Run. Ej. 142, 3. See tit. Attachment.

Besides the ordinary method of proceeding, there are certain auxiliary means for the recovery of costs, as between party and party. These means are by moving to stay the proceedings, until security be given for the payment of costs; or until the costs are paid of a former action for the same cause; or by deducting the costs of one action from those of another. As examples of these means, it may be mentioned, that in ejectment (1 Str. 681.) and actions qui tam (Id. 697. 705: Barnes, 126.), where the plaintiff, or his lessor, is unknown to the defendant, and in case the plaintiff is a foreigner residing abroad (1 Term Rep. 267. 362. 491.), the defendant may call for an account of his residence, or place of abode, from the opposite attorney; and if he refuse to give it, or give in a fictitious account of a person who cannot be found, the court will stay the proceedings, until security be given for the payment of costs.

The Court of K. B. stated that in the following three instances only they would oblige the plaintiff to give security for costs. 1. When an infant sues. 2. When the plaintiff resides abroad. 3. When there has been a former ejectment. 1 T. R. 490.

The Court of C. P. would not compel security for costs in error, because the plaintiff in error was a lunatic. 2 B. & P. 437. Nor from a plaintiff in a qui tam action, though it appeared he was insolvent. See Tidd, 534.

After the defendant has agreed to take short notice of trial, the court will not compel the plaintiff, though a foreigner, and resident abroad, to give security for costs. Ibid.

If a foreigner sue two defendants, and only one of them puts in bail, that one may require the plaintiff to give security for costs. 6 T. R. 496.

Where a foreign seaman had brought an Vol. I.-58 court refused to compel the plaintiff to give security for costs on account of his being on a voyage on board an English ship. 2 H. B. 383. See also 1 B. & P. 96: 2 B. & P. 236: 2 Taunt. 253.

The Court of K. B. required an uncertificated bankrupt, who brought trover for goods, to give security for costs. 7 T. R. 296. But see 2 Taunt. 61.

An application to make the plaintiff, who resided abroad, give security for the costs, was refused after notice of trial given, as the defendant might have applied earlier after knowledge of the fact of the plaintiff's residence, and before so much of the costs were incurred. Walters v. Frythall, 5 East, 338. See Tidd, 534. (9th ed.)

The court will compel security for costs where plaintiff resides abroad, without a previous application to his attorney: but they will not order a stay of proceedings, unless such application has been made. Baillie v. Bernales, 1 B. & A. 331. Term Rep. K. B.:

Where the plaintiff, after issue joined, had been convicted of felony, and received sentence of transportation, the court compelled him or his attorney to give security for costs retrospective and prospective. Harvey v. Jacob,

By 59 G. 3. c. 99. § 45. sceurity may be required in an action for non-residence. An executor, plaintiff residing abroad, may be required to give it; 1 Brod. & B. 277; and so also a plaintiff in error; 5 Barn. & Ald. 265; and a defendant in replevin. 1 Brod. & B. 505. By rule 98 H. T. 1832, the application for such security must, in ordinary cases, be made before issue joined.

The practice of deducting or setting off the costs in one action against those in another, however agreeable to natural justice, does not seem to have obtained till lately in the Court of K. B. 2 Stra. 891. 1203: Bull. N. P. 336: 4 Term Rep. 124. But in C. P. it has been frequently allowed, and that not only where the parties have been the same, but also where they have been in some measure Barnes, 145: 2 Black. Rep. 826: Bull. N. P. 336.

The lien of the plaintiff's attorney upon the debt and costs recovered in the cause, after affirmance upon a writ of error, must be satisfied before the defendants are entitled to set them off against a judgment recovered by them in another cause against the plaintiff.

1 Maul. & Selw. Rep. 240.

By rule 93 of H. T. 1832, no set-off of damages and costs between parties shall be allowed, to the prejudice of the attorney's lien for costs in the particular suit, against which the set-off is sought; provided nevertheless that interlocutory costs in the same suit awarded to the adverse party may be deducted. And see Tidd, 339. (9th ed.) and Merrifield on Costs.

As between attorney and client, the former may maintain an action against the latter for the recovery of his costs. Cro. Car. 159, 160.

—But by the stat. 3 Jac. 1. c. 7. § 1. attorneys and solicitors must deliver a bill to their clients before bringing an action: and by stat. 2 G. 2. c. 23. § 23. (explained by stat. 12 G. 2. c. 13. and made perpetual by stat. 30 G. 2. c. 10. § 75.) no attorney nor solicitor shall commence any action till the expiration of one month after the delivery of his bill: which is directed by the acts to be in a common legible hand, in English, except law-terms, and subscribed with the attorney's hand.

The said stat. 2 G. 2. c. 23. also directs the mode of taxation of attorneys' bills by the officers of the several courts; and directs that if the bill taxed be less by a sixth part than the bill delivered, the attorney shall pay the costs of taxation; but if it shall not be less, the costs shall be in the discretion of the court.

By rule 91 H. T. 1832, the order to deliver or tax an attorney's bill may be made at the return of one summons, the same having been served two days before it is returnable. One appointment only shall be deemed necessary for proceeding in the taxation of costs or of an attorney's bill.

If the whole bill be for conveyancing, or for business done at the quarter sessions, &c. it cannot be taxed. But where an attorney had delivered two separate bills, one of which was for fees and disbursements in causes, and the other for making conveyances, a rule was made for taxing both. And so where it was moved that the master might be directed to tax those articles in an attorney's bill which related to conveyancing and parliamentary business, the rest being for management of causes in the Court of King's Bench, Lord Mansfield said, there was no doubt but the master might tax the whole. Barnes, C. B. 141, 2: 4 Term. Rep. 124: Say. Rep. 233: Say. Costs, 310.

If any part of the bill be for business done in court, the bill must be delivered according to the act. Tidd, 328. and cases there cited. And a warrant of attorncy (4 Camp. 68: 2 Stark. Ca. 538: 3 B. & C. 157.), or a dedimus potestatem charged in the bill, is sufficient to enable the court to refer it for taxation. 1 New R. 266: 4 Camp. 69: Tidd, ubi supra. So also a charge for attending at a lock-up house, filling up a bail-bond, and obtaining defendant's release. 6 Barn. & C. 86. And see Tidd, 328. (9th ed.) The K.B. will refer the bill to be taxed, though all the business was done at the sessions or in the Insolvent

It is not necessary for the executor or administrator of an attorney to deliver a bill of costs, for business done by his testator or intestate, before the commencement of an action (Cas. Pr. C. B. 58.); the stat. 2 G. 2. c. 23. § 23. being confined to actions brought by the attorney himself, and not extending to his personal representatives. And in the Court

If an attorney refuse to deliver a bill to his client, the latter may compel him, by taking out a summons before a judge; and if the attorney, on being served therewith, do not attend, an order will be made for delivering it, within a reasonable time. If he still neglect to deliver it, the order should be made a rule of court; and on serving the same, and making affidavit thereof, the court on motion will grant an attachment. Doug. 8vo. 199. in n. Imp. K. B. 479. The bill being delivered, the client may apply for a judge's summons, to show cause why it should not be referred to the proper officer to be taxed; upon which an order will be made, the client undertaking to pay what shall appear to be due upon such taxation. By the 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 42. § 36., the judges are empowered to order the officers of the courts at Westminster indiscriminately to tax costs in respect of business done in any of such courts, but no rule has yet been made pursuant to this authority.

By § 32. where several persons shall be made defendants in any personal action, and any one or more of them shall have a nolle prosequi entered as to him or them, or upon the trial of such action shall have a vertice pass for him or them, every such person shall have judgment for and recover his reasonable costs, unless in the case of a trial, the judge before whom such cause shall be tried shall certify upon the record under his hand that there was a reasonable cause for making such person a defendant in such action.

A variety of regulations with regard to costs have been made by the recent rules of court, which will be found in the books of practice.

VI. In Criminal Prosecutions.—The Court of King's Bench has no power to award costs to prosecutors by indictment, nor to compel a defendant to go before the master. 6 T. R. 144. A judge cannot certify for the costs of a special jury, under 24 G. 2. c. 18. § 1. in criminal cases. 1 Esp. 226.

As to costs to prosecutors and parties grieved, on indictments relating to the non-repair of highways, see stat. 5 T. R. 272: 6 T. R. 344; 3 M. & S. 465: 2 B. & A. 522:

4 M. & S. 203.

As to costs on quo warranto information, see 1 Anst. 178: 1 T. R. 453: 1 B. & C., lables have the signification of a little house 237: 5 T. R. 375.

On removal of an indictment to an adjoining county, under 38 G. 3. c. 62. § 12. see 4

In general by justices in all convictions under 18 G. 3. c. 19. see 5 T. R. 356: 6 T.

By justices in sessions, 4 T. R. 218: 7 T. R. 377: 8 T. R. 583.

On criminal informations, 2 T. R. 145. 190: 3 Price, 72.

Costs to prosecutors and witnesses in all cases of felony are given by stat. 7 G. 4. c. 64, § 22. and in cases of specified misdemeanors, by § 23. of the same.

Costs on summary convictions under the stat. 7 and 8 G. 4. c. 29. are given by § 67. of that act, and in 7 and 8 G. 4. c. 30. by § 33.

In actions against magistrates and others for any thing done in pursuance of these acts, costs are given by 7 and 8 G. 4. § 75: c. 30. § 41.

Costs in Equity, are allowed for failing to make an answer to a bill exhibited; or making an insufficient answer: and if a first answer be certified by a master to be insufficient, the defendant is to pay 40s. costs; 3l. for a second insufficient answer; 4l. for a third, &c. But if the answer be reported good, the plaintiff shall pay the defendant 40s. costs. An answer is not to be filed (till when it is not reputed an answer,) until costs for contempt in not answering are paid. stat. 4 and 5, Anne c. 16. if a plaintiff in Chancery dismisses his own bill, or the defendant dismisses the same for want of prosecution, costs are allowed to the defendant.

In other cases it seems that the matter of costs to be given to either party is not in equity held to be a point of right, but merely discretionary, under stat. 17 R. 2. c. 6. according to the circumstances of the case. Yet the stat. 15 H. 6. c. 14. which requires surety to satisfy the party grieved his damages, on granting the subpæna, seems expressly to direct that, as well damages as costs shall be given to the defendant, if wrongfully vexed in this court.

In case of a great fraud, a person may be obliged to pay such costs as shall be ascertained by the injured party's oath.—2 Vern.

The subject of costs in equity is too extensive to be satisfactorily treated of in such a work as the present, and the reader is referred for information upon it to Mr. Beames's treatise on the subject.

COT. In the old Saxon signifies cottage, and so is still used in many parts of Eng-

COTARIUS. A cottager: the cotarii, or cottagers, are mentioned in Domesday.

COTE and COT. The names of places which begin or end with these words or sylor cottage: there are likewise dove cotes, which are small houses or places for the keeping of doves or pigeons. See title Pigeon tage, house, or homestall. Cowel.

COTERELLUS. Cotarius and coterellus, according to Spelman and Du Fresne, are servile tenants: but in Domesday and other ancient MSS, there appears a distinction as well in their tenure and quality, as in their name. For the cotarius held a free socage tenure, and paid a stated firm or rent in provisions or money, with some occasional customary services; whereas the coteuellus seems to have held in mere villenage, and his person, issue and goods, were disposable at the pleasure of the lord. Paroch. Antiq. 310.

COTESWOLD. Is used for sheep-cotes and sheep feeding on hills: from the Sax. cote and wold a place where there is no wood.

COTGARE. A kind of refuse wool, so clung or clotted together, that it cannot be pulled asunder. By stat. 13 R. 2. c. 9. it is provided, that neither denizen nor foreigner shall make any other refuse of wools but cotgare and villein.

COTLAND and COTSETHLAND. Land held by a cottager, whether in socage or vil-lenage. Paroch. Antiq. 532.

CÖTSETHLA, COTSETLE. The little seat or mansion belonging to a small farm.

Cartular. Malmsbur. MS.

COTSETHUS. A cottage holder, who, by servile tenure, was bound to work for the lord. Cowel. Cotsets are the meanest sort of men, now termed cottagers. And cotseti are those who live in cottages. Leg. Hen. 1. c.

COTTAGE, cotagium.] A little house for habitation, without lands belonging to it.

By the stat. 31 Eliz. c. 7. cottages were prohibited to be erected without laying at least four acres of land to the same: and divers other restrictions were thereby enjoined. But this was repealed by the stat. 15 G. 3. c. 32. setting forth that the said stat. of 31 Eliz. had laid the industrious poor under great difficulties to procure habitations, and tended very much to lessen population; and in divers other respects was inconvenient to the labouring part of the nation in general.

COTTON LIBRARY. For better settling and preserving the library kept in the house at Westminster, called Cottonhouse, in the name and family of the Cottons for the benefit of the public, a statute was made, 12 W. 3. c. 7. See stats. 5 Anne, c. 30: 26 G. 2. cr 22.

COTUCA. Coat armour. Walsing. 114. COTUCHANS. Boors or husbandmen, of whom mention is made in Domesday.

COUCHER, or COURCHER. A factor that continues abroad in some place or country for traffic; as formerly in Gascoign, for buying of wines. Stat. 37 Ed. 3. e. 16. This word is also used for the general book wherein any corporation, &c. register their particular acts. 3 and 4 Ed. 6. c. 10.

COVENABLE, Fr. covenable, Lat. ratio-nabilis.] What is convenient or suitable.— Every of the same three sorts of goods, &c. shall be good and covenable, as in old time hath been used. Stat. 31 Ed. 3. c. 2. Covenably endowed, that is, endowed as is fitting. Stat. 4 H. 8. c. 12. See Plowd. 472.

COVENANT, CONVENTIO.] The agreement or consent of two or more by deed in writing, sealed and delivered; whereby either, or one of the parties doth promise to the other that something is done already or shall be done afterwards: he that makes the covenant is called the covenantor: and he to whom it is made, the covenantee. See Shep. Touchst. 160. and on the whole of this subject at length,

I. The several Kinds of Covenants, and by what Words they are created.

II. What Covenants are good and binding, and by whom they may be made.

III. Who shall take Advantage of Covenants, and who are bound by them.

IV. What shall be a Performance, and what a Breach of Covenant .- And of Penalties for Non-performance.

I. The several kinds of Covenants, and by what words they are created .- A covenant is generally either in fact or in law; in fact is that which is expressly agreed between the parties, and inserted in the deed; and in law, is that covenant which the law intends and implies, though it be not expressed in words; as if a lessor demise and grant to his lessee a house or lands, &c. for a certain term, the law will intend a covenant on the lessor's part, that the lessee shall, during the term, quietly enjoy the same against all incumbrances. 1 Inst. 384.

As to implied covenants, see 9 Barn. & C. 505: 1 Bing. 433. A covenant by a lessee to supply lessor and his tenants at all seasons of burning lime, with lime at a certain price, contains an implied covenant to burn lime at all such seasons. 2 Barn. & Ald. 487.

There is also a covenant real, and covenant personal: a covenant real is that whereby a man ties himself to pass a thing real, as lands or tenements; or to levy a fine of lands, &c. And covenant personal is where the same is annexed to the person and merely personal; as if a person covenants with another by deed to build him a house, or to serve him, &c. F. N. B. 145: 5 Rep. 10.

Covenants are likewise inherent, that tend to the support of the land or thing granted; or are collateral to it; and are affirmative, where somewhat is to be performed; or negative; executed, of what is already done, or executory; a covenant being to bind a man to do something in future, is for the most part executory. 1 Vent. 176: Dyer, 112. 271.

A covenant to settle or convey particular lands will not at law create a lien upon the lands; but in equity such a covenant, if for a valuable consideration, will be deemed a specific lien on the lands, and decreed against all persons claiming under the covenantor, except purchasers for valuable consideration, and without notice of such covenant. Finch v. Earl of Winchelsea, 1 P. Wms. 282: Freemoult v. Dedire, 1 P. Wms. 429: Coventry v. Coventry, best reported at the end of Francis's Maxims. For equity considers that as done which, being distinctly agreed to be done, ought to have been done. Grounds and Rudiments of Law and Equity, p. 75.

A general covenant to settle lands of a certain value, without mentioning any lands in particular, will not create a specific lien on any of the lands of the covenantor, and therefore cannot be specifically decreed in equity. Freemoult v. Dedire, 1 P. Wms. 430. But if the covenantor expressly declares the settlement to be in execution of his power, though the particular lands to be charged be not specified, equity will ascertain them. Coventry v. Coventry, Francis's Maxims:

Gilb. Rep. 160.

It is held in all cases where words that begin any sentence are conditional, and give another remedy, they shall not be construed a covenant; and yet if words of condition and covenant are coupled together in the same sentence, as, provided always, and it is covenanted, &c., in that case they may be adadjudged both a condition and covenant. March. 103, See 8 Barn. & C. 308: 2 Bing,

The law does not seem to have appropriated any set form of words, as absolutely necessary to be made use of in creating a covenant; and therefore it seems that any words will be effectual for that purpose which show the party's concurrence to the performance of a future act; as if lessee for years covenants to repair, &c., provided always, and it is agreed, that the lessor shall find great timber. &c.; this makes a covenant on the part of the lessor to find great timber, by the word agreed; and it shall not be a qualification of the covenant of the lessee. See 1 Burr. 290.

"The dependence or independence of covenants is to be collected from the evident sense and meaning of the parties; and, however transposed they may be in a deed, their precedency must depend on the order of time in which the intent of the transaction requires their performance." Per Lord Mansfield, Jones v. Berkeley, Dougl. 665. See also Hotham v. The East India Company, 1 Term Rep. 638. Where the participle doing, performing, paying, repairing, is prefixed to a covenant, it is clearly a mutual covenant, and not a condition precedent. Boone v. Eyre, 2 Black Rep. 1312: Allen v. Babington, Sid. 280: Atkinson v. Morrice, 12 Mod. 503. But where the covenant goes to the whole consideration on both sides, there it is a condition precedent. Duke of St. Alban's v. Shore, 1 H. Black. Rep. 270. See Bac. Ab. tits. | act which he could not prevent was no breach.

If one makes a lease for years, reserving a rent, action of covenant lies for non-payment of the rent; for the reddendum of the rent is an agreement for payment of it, which will make a covenant. 2 Danv. 230. See 1 Barn. and Cres. 410. A lease is made to two, and one seals the deed, but the other doth not; if he accepts the estate, and occupies the land, he is bound to perform the covenants for payment of the rent, reparations, and the like. 1 Shep. Abr. 458.

If one man covenants to pay another 201. at a day, although he may have action for debt for the 201., yet it is said he may have covenant at his election. 2 Danv. 229.

It is agreed that A. B. shall pay to C. D. 100l. for lands in E.; this is a mutual covenant, whereon action of covenant may be brought if C. D. will not convey. 1 Sid. 423. But where there are mutual covenants, and the one not to be performed before a precedent covenant, in such case one covenant is not suable till the other is performed: though if the covenants are distinct and mutual, several actions may be brought by and against the parties. 1 Lil. Abr. 350: 2 Mod. 74. In a covenant to pay another so much money, he making him an estate in such land, &c., it has been adjudged, that if he tender the covenantor a feoffment, and offer to make livery, he may have action of covenant for the money, as if he had made a title. 3 Salk.

Where a man covenants that he hath power to grant, and that the grantee shall quietly enjoy notwithstanding any claiming under him; these are distinct covenants, for one goes to the title, and the other to the possession. 1 Mod. 101.

There is this difference, however, between a covenant and condition; a condition gives entry, and covenant gives an action only. Owen, 54. A person cannot have action of covenant upon a verbal agreement, for it cannot be grounded without writing, except by special custom. F. N. B. 145.

II. What covenants are good and binding, and by whom they may be made .- All covenants between persons must be to do what is lawful, or they will not be binding; and if the thing to be done be impossible, the covenant is void. Dyer, 112. But where the thing is lawful at the time of the covenant made, and afterwards the matter agreed to be done is prohibited by act of parliament, yet such covenant will be binding. 3 Mod. 39. And if a man covenants to do a thing before a certain time, and it becomes impossible by the act of God, this shall not excuse him, inasmuch as he hath bound himself precisely to do it. 2 Danv. Abr. 84. Where a party covenanted that he had not done nor suffered to be done any act whereby an estate was: encumbered, it was held that assenting to an

Though a covenant to stand seised of lands to be after purchased be void at law, unless there be some new act to be done; yet it seems that a covenant to settle lands of such a value will charge after-purchased lands, though the covenantor had none at the time of executing the covenant. Took v. Hastings, 2 Vern. 97.

If a person covenants expressly to repair a house, and it is burnt down by lightning, or any other accident, yet he ought to repair it, for it was in his power to have provided against it by his contract. Alleyn, 26, 27: 1 Lil. Abr. 149. But he is not so bound by covenant in law. Where houses are blown down by tempest, the law excuses the lessee in an actian of waste; though in a covenant to repair and uphold, it will not. 1 Plowd.

A proviso in a lease granted by a tenant for life (under a power to lease, reserving the usual covenants,) that in case the premises were blown down or burnt, the lessee should rebuild, otherwise the rent should cease, is void, the jury finding such a covenant to be unusual. 1 T. R. 705.

A lessee of a house who covenants generally to repair, is bound to repair if it is burnt by an accidental fire; 6 T. R. 650; and equity will not relieve or stay the action by injunction. 18 Ves. 115: 3 Anst. 687. And so is the assignee of a lease containing such a covenant. 2 Chitt. 608. And so even a tenant covenanting to repair, damage by fire only excepted, continues liable to payment of rent, notwithstanding the premises are destroyed by fire. 3 Const. 687.

On a covenant to build a bridge in a substantial manner, and to keep it in repair for a certain time, the party is bound to rebuild the bridge, though broken down by an extraordinary flood. 6 T. R. 750.

Under a covenant that the tenant "should and would substantially repair, uphold, and maintain," a house, he is bound to keep up the inside painting. 1 C. & P. 265.

If a lessee for years, rendering rent, covenants for him and his assigns to repair the house, and after the lessee assigns over the term, and the lessor accepts the rent from the assignee, and then the covenant is broken; notwithstanding acceptance of rent from the assignee, action of covenant lies against the first lessee, on his express covenant to repair; and this personal covenant cannot be transferred by the acceptance of the rent. 2 Danv. Abr. 240. See tit. Assignment and post, III.

Action of covenant also lies on covenant for payment of rent against such lessee; but not action of debt after acceptance. 3 Rep. 24. In covenant upon a demise, rendering rent, the defendant eannot say, that part of it was to be allowed, for this is a covenant against a covenant. Comb. 21.

An infant within age may bind himself ap-statute may be bound by covenant for his apprenticeship, so as to make him liable to an action of covenant if he depart, &c. But by the custom of London, he may bind himself by his covenant at fourteen years old. 1 Cro. 129: Winch. 63.

A covenant by a tenant to yield up in re-pair, at the expiration of his lease, all buildings which should be erected during the term upon the demised premises, includes buildings erected and used by the tenant for the purpose of trade and manufacture, if they be let into the soil or otherwise fixed to the freehold, but not where they rest merely upon blocks or patterns. 1 Taunt. 19.

III. Who shall take Advantage of Covenants, and who are bound by them .- There may be an agreement and covenant only to be performed by the parties themselves; and there are some covenants which none but the party and his heirs may take advantage of, being such as concern the inheritance, and descend to the heir, as knit to the estate: covenants in gross go to the executors, &c. 1 Rol. Abr. 520: 2 Danv. 235. Not only parties to deeds, but their executors and administrators, shall take advantage of inherent covenants, though not named; and every assignee of the land may have the benefit of such covenants: likewise executors and assigns are bound by them, although not named, as a covenant to repair, &c. 5 Rep. 16, 17: 1 Cro. 552. If a man covenants with another to do any thing, his heir shall not be bound, unless he be expressly named: and yet where a lessee covenants to repair, the heir shall have the benefit of the covenant, though not named, because it runs with the land. 2 Lev. 92: 5 Rep. 8.

The executors and administrators of the covenantor will be bound by the covenant, though not named, unless the covenant be of such a nature as not to allow of it being performed by any other person but the covenantor. See Dyer, 14. pl. 69: 1 Roll. Abr. 519. l. 35: Hyde v. Dean and Canons of Windsor, Cro. Eliz. 553.

One who covenants for himself, his heirs, &c., and under his own hand and seal, for the act of another, shall be personally bound by his covenant, though he describe himself in deed as covenanting for and on the part and behalf of such other person. Appleton v. Binks, 5 East, 148. See Burrell v. Jones, 3 Appleton v. Barn. & A. 47. Though a covenant be joint in its terms, yet if the interests of the covenantees be several, each may sue separately for a breach. 5 D. & R. 106: 3 B. & C. 254: and see 10 Barn. & C. 410: 6 Barn. & C. 718.

A covenant with two and every of them is joint though the two are several parties to the deed. 3 Taunt. 87.

Where the assignees of a bankrupt advertised the lease of certain premises, of which prentice; but neither at common law nor by the bankrupt was lessee, for sale by auction (without stating themselves to be the owners or possessed thereof,) and no bidder offering, they never took possession in fact of the premises; held that this was no more than an experiment to ascertain the value, whether the lease was beneficial or not to the creditors, and did not amount to an assent on the part of the assignees to take the term; nor support an averment in a declaration in covenant against them by the landlord that all the estate, right, title, interest, &c. of the bankrupt in the premises came to the defendants by assignment thereof. Turner v. Richardson and another, assignces of Burber, 7 East, 335. See 4 Camp. R. 368. But if there is a purchaser, and a deposit paid, it is an acceptance, although the contract go off. 1 Holt, Ca. 290; and see 1 Dow. & Ry. 205: 1 Ry. & Moo. 207: 2 Stark. 309.

By the new bankrupt act, 6 G. 4. c. 16. § 75. the bankrupt is discharged from the covenants in the lease if the assignces accept the lease, and also in case they decline it, if the bankrupt deliver up the lease to the lessor within fourteen days after he has notice of their declining it. See Bac. Abr. tit. Bankrupt. (F.) (ed. 7. by Gwillim and Dodd.)

All persons to whom the land descended were by the common law entitled to the benefit of covenants which run with the land; but grantees of the reversion were not. The stat. 32 Hen. 8. c. 34. therefore enacted, "that all grantees, &c. of reversions should have the like advantages against the lessees, their executors, &c. by entry for non-payment for the rent, or for doing waste, or other forfeiture; and the same remedy, by action only, for not performing other conditions, covenants, or agreements contained in the leases, against the lessees, as the lessors or grantors had." The statute also gives the lessees the same remedy against the grantees of the reversion, which they might have had against their grantors. It must not, however, be understood from the general words of the statute, that the grantee of the reversion can take benefit of every forfeiture by force of a condition, Lord Coke conceiving the operation of the statute to be confined to such conditions as are either incident to the reversion, as rent, or for the benefit of the state; as for not doing of waste, for keeping the houses in repair, for making of fences, or such like; and not for the payment of any sum in gross, delivery of corn, wood, or the like. See Co. Lit. 215. where a variety of resolutions upon this statute are stated, and the authorities referred to. See also 6 Vin. Ab. Covenant, (K. 3.) p. 397: Webb v. Russell, 3 T. R. 393.— See farther, Bac. Ab. Covenant, (E. 6.): Vin.

Ab. Covenant, (K. 3.)
The liability of the assignee does not extend to covenants broken before the assignment; as a covenant to build within a certain time, which was past before the assignment. Grescott v. Green, 1 Salk. 199: St. Saviour's, Southwark v. Smith, 3 Burr. 1271: 1 Black. dity of such assignment was denied. R. 351. Nor is the assignee to be affected by any covenant broken after he has assigned over. Boulton v. Canon, 1 Freem. 336.

Upon a covenant to repair and keep in repair during the continuance of the term, an action may be maintained for breaches before the term has expired. Luxmore v. Robson,

1 Barn. & A. 584.

A collateral covenant to be done upon the land, as to build de novo, shall bind the assignee by express words; in this case the assignees are bound by the terms of the covenant, for unless named, they would not be bound by law; "for the covenant concerns a thing which was not in esse, at the time of the demise made; but to be newly built after, and therefore shall bind the covenantor, his executors, and administrators, and not the assignee; for the law will not annex the covenant to a thing which hath no being." Spencer's case, 5 Co. 16. b. But as the law would sustain such a covenant against the covenantor and his assigns, if expressly included in the covenant, and give damages for its non-performance, it should seem to follow, that the covenantee would be entitled in equity to a decree for the specific performance of such covenant to build; and of this opinion Lord Hardwicke appears to have been in the case of the City of London v. Nash, 3 Atk. 515: 1 Vez. 12. But in the case of Lucas v. Commerford, 3 Bro. C. R. 166. Lord Thurlow, C. J. held, " that there could not be a decree to build in pursuance of a covenant, for that he could no more undertake the conduct of a rebuilding than of a repair."

In a lease of ground with liberty to make a water-course, and erect a mill, the lessee covenanted for himself, &c., and his assigns, not to have persons to work in the mill who were settled in other parishes without a certificate. The court held that this covenant did not run with the land, or bind the assignce of the lessee. 10 E. R. 130.

A covenant by a lessor to supply the demised premises with a sufficient quantity of good water at a certain rate runs with the land, and the assignee of the lessee may sue the reversioner upon it. 4 Barn. & A. 266. So also a covenant to insure premises within the bills of mortality against fire. . 5 Barn.

& A. 1.

At law the assignee is liable only for the rent actually incurred, or covenants broken during his possession. Boulton v. Canon, 1 Freem. 336. If therefore he assign the very day before the rent becomes due, the lessor cannot maintain his action for it. Tovey v. Pitcher, Carth. 177: 4 Mod. 71: 3 Co. 22:1 Salk. 81: 1 Frèem. 326. See Paul v. Nurse, 8 Barn. & C. 486. Nor will the circumstance of such assignment being per fraudem, as to a beggar, alter the case. Leroux v. Nash, Str. 1221: Buller's N. P. 159. But see Knight v. Freeman, 1 Vent. 329. 331: T.

whatever may the rule of law upon this point, it seems to be now settled, that courts of equity will compel an assignee of a term to account for the rent the whole time he enjoyed the Treacle v. Coke, 1 Vern. 105. ther equity will, in order to secure the future rents, under any circumstances, restrain an assignee from assigning to a beggar or insolvent person, was considered, but not determined in the case of Philpot v. Hoare, 2 Atk. 219. It seems such an assignment is valid. 2 Madd. R. 330: 1 Bos. & P. 21. If the assignee offer to give up the possession to the lessor on reasonable terms, and the lessor refuse to accept such surrender, it were clearly too much for a court of equity, in restriction of a legal right, to prevent the assignment. Vaillant v. Dodomede, 2 Atk. 546. But supposing the lessor to be willing to accept of a surrender of the term, and the assignee wantonly to insist on his legal right to assign, when and to whom he pleased, it seems that, under certain circumstances, a court of equity might, without impropriety, interpose to prevent the abuse of such right: and this Lord Hardwicke appears to admit in Vaillant v. Dodomede; for having stated the legal right and the propriety of courts of equity in general following the rule of law, he observes, "but it is true in some sort of assignments, made by tenants, the court has interposed;" nor does the difficulty reported to have occurred to Lord Hardwicke, in Philpot v. Hoare, appear, upon examination, to have been entitled to much attention. His lordship is reported to have said, " As to the accruing rents, it is a point of more difficulty; for the covenant in this lease not to assign, does not run with the land to the assignee, because assignees are not bound by name in the covenant." Whence it might be inferred, that if assignees had been expressly included in the covenant, his lordship would have considered them bound by the covenant. But whether assignees be bound or not by a covenant, does not (except in the case of a collateral covenant to be done upon the land) depend upon their being named in the covenant; for if the covenant run with the land, assignees are bound, whether named or not; and if the covenant do not run with the land, but is a a personal contract, or respects something to be done purely collateral to, and not on the land, they are not bound, though they be expressly named. See Spencer's case, 5 Co. 16. b. 17. a. Therefore, whether the assignee was named or not, was immaterial to the question, whether the assignee was bound by the covenant not to assign without consent of the lessor? Nor does it appear as having been necessary in order to determine whether a court of equity should restrain an assignment to a beggar, previously to determining whether the assignee was bound by the covenant not to assign; for supposing the assignee to Raym. 303: T. Jones, 109. in which the vali- be bound at law by the covenant, equity may restrain the wanton and fraudulent breach of a covenant; and supposing him not to be bound, yet he may be affected in conscience upon the same principle that the assignee of a merely personal covenant may be affected in conscience, though not bound at law. See City of London v. Richmond, 2 Vern. 421: Treat. of Equity, 350. in n.

An action of covenant lies against the assignee of a lessee of an estate, for a part of the rent, as in such case the action is brought on a real contract in respect of the land, and not on a personal contract, and in case of eviction the rent may be apportioned as in debt or replevin. Aliter in covenant against the lessee himself, who is liable on his personal contract. 2 E. R. 575.

The assignee of the reversion of part of the premises may sue upon the covenant to repair, for the covenant is divisible, though it is otherwise as to a condition. Twynam v. Pickard, 2 Barn. & A. 105.

The devisee of the equity of redemption (the legal fee being in a mortgagee) is not liable in covenant as assignee of all the estate, right, title, and interest of the original cove-nantor. 3 E. R. 487.

A party taking an assignment by way of mortgage is liable on the covenants as assignee. Williams v. Bosanquet, 1 Brod. & B. 238. Unless the interest passing to the assignee is of a real nature, he is not liable to covenants made by the grantee or lessed in respect of it. Portman v. Bunn, 1 Barn. & C. 694.

A covenant in a lease that the lessee, his executors, and administrators, shall constantly reside on the demised premises during the demise, is binding upon the assignee of the lessee, though he be not named, being quodam modo annexed and appurtenant to the thing demised. 2 H. B. 133.

The grantee of a reversion may bring action of covenant against a lessee, as well in the county where the demise was made, as in the county where the lands lie. Carthew, 183. A person covenants with another, to pay him money at a time to come, and doth not say to his executors, &c.; if the covenantee die before the day, yet his executors or administrators shall have the money. Dyer, 112. 127. And in every case where the testator is bound by a covenant, the executor shall be bound by it; if it be not determined by his death. 48 Ed. 3, 2: 2 Danv. 232.

If A. seised of land in fee, conveys it to B., and covenants with B., his heirs and assigns, to make any other assurance upon request: and after B. conveys it to C., who conveys it to D., and then D. requires A. to make another assurance, according to the covenant: if he refuses, D. shall have an action of covenant against him, as assignee to B. 2 Dans. 236. A lessor made a lease of a house for years, excepting two rooms and free passage to them; the lessee assigned the term, and the lessor brought covenant against the assignee for disturbing him in his passage to those rooms; and adjudged that the action lies; for the covenant as to the passage goes with the tenement, and binds the assignee. 1 Salk. 196. If a man who leases for years ousts the lessee, he shall have covenant against him. 48 Ed. 3. 2.—See 2 Danv. 234. A man grants a watercourse, and alterwards stops it; for this voluntary misfeasance, covenant lies. 1 Saund. 322. Though where the use of a thing is demised, and it runs to decay, so that the lessee cannot have the benefit of it, for this nonfeasance no action of covenant lieth: nor may covenant be brought for a thing which was not in esse at the making of the lease. 2 Danv. 233.

covenant lies. 3 Bul. 12.

A covenant for the lessee to enjoy against all men: this extends not to tortious acts and entries, &c., for which the lessee hath his proper remedy against the aggressors. Vaugh. 111. 120.

Where there is a covenant to save harmless against a certain person, there the covenantor must save the covenantee harmless against the entry of that person, be it by wrong or rightful title: but if it be to save harmless against all persons, the entry and eviction must be by lawful title. Cro. Eliz. 213. Acc.: 1 Barn. & Cres. 29: 2 Dow. & Ry. 33: and see 2 Will. Saund. 178. a. The reason is because, as it regards such acts as may arise from rightful claim, a man may well be supposed to covenant against all the world; but it would be an extravagant extension of such a covenant if it were good against all the acts which the folly or malice of strangers might suggest; and therefore the law has properly restrained it within its reasonable import, that is, to lawful title. Per Ellenborough, 5 Maule & S. 374. Where the covenant is to do a thing, and no time appointed for performance, it must be done in convenient time. 2 And. 72: Dyer, 57. 150: Hob. 28.

But a covenant must wait upon and join with the grant; so that if it be to make such assurance as shall be reasonably devised, it must be of an assurance that differs not from the bargain: and when the estate to which a covenant is annexed is at an end, the covenant is gone. Hob. 276: 1 Leon. 179. In an indenture, the word covenant is the word both of lessor and lessee; and therefore if the lessee covenants to pay the rent, this is a reservation. Though when there is a covenant for a lessee to repair, and he makes an under-lease to one who is in possession, the under-lessee is not liable to that covenant, in law or equity.

1 Rol. Rep. 80: 1 Vern. 87.

If a lessor covenant with a lessee that he shall have housebote, &c. by assignment of his bailiff, this is a good covenant: and yet it doth not restrain the power that the lessee hath by law to take those things without assignment: but if a lessee covenants that he in such case; but where a jointure or dower will not cut any timber without the leave or is recovered it is. Skin. 397: Moor, 859: Palm. assignment of the lessor; by this he will be restrained. Dyer, 19, 115.

Covenant lies by devisee of lands in fce, upon a covenant, made by defendant to the testator, to whom defendant conveyed the lands in fee, that the defendant was lawfully seised, &c. For such covenant runs with the land, and though broken in the lifetime of the testator, is a continuing breach in the lifetime of the devisee: and it is sufficient to allege for damage, that thereby the lands are of a less value to the devisee, and that he is prevented from selling them so advantageously as he otherwise might do. Kingdom v. Nottle, 4 Maule & S. 53.

Covenant lies by the heir, upon a covenant made to the ancestor and his heirs, to whom the lands are conveyed in fee by husband and wife, that he and his wife shall make farther assurance upon request of the ancestor and his heirs; and the heir may well assign for breach that his ancestor requested the husband that he and his wife would levy a fine to pass the estate of the wife legally to him and his heirs, which they refused to do be-fore their decease, per quod after the death of the ancestor, the devisee of the wife ejected the heir. Jones v. King, 4 Maule & S. 188.

IV. What shall be a Performance, and what a Breach of Covenant; and of Penalties for Non-performance.—The most frequent use of a covenant is to bind a man to do something in future, and therefore it is for the most part executory; and if the covenantor do not perform it, the covenantee may thereupon for his relief have an action or writ of covenant, against the covenantor, so often as there is any breach of the covenant. Shep. Touchst. 161. et seq.

Not any duty or cause of action arises on a covenant, till it is broken; and as to breaches of covenant, if a person by his own act disables himself to perform a covenant, it is a breach thereof. 5 Rep. 21. Though there can be no covenant or breach, where a lease, &c. is void. Yelv. 18, 19. But here, although when a covenant concerns the interest of the lease, as where it is for paying rent, it is void, if the lease be so; yet where covenants are collateral to the lease and interest, though that be void, the covenants may be could Owen, 136. And if a covenant to do a thing is performed in substance, and according to the intent, it is good, though it differs from the words; and on the other hand, although the covenantor performs the letter of his covenant, if he does not act to defeat the intent and use of it, he is guilty of a breach. Mod. Ent. Eng.

In covenant that a person shall hold land free from all incumbrances, and be kept indemnified from arrears of rent; there, till an action is brought, or distress made, he is not damnified; and a suit in Chancery is no breach | for a breach by the defendant; for the damage

339. When the intention of the parties can be collected out of a deed, for the doing or not doing of the thing, covenant shall be had thereupon. Chanc. Rep. 294. A covenant, being one part of a deed, is subject to the are general, shall be expounded by the first words, which are special and particular. Vent.

When a covenant is to two persons jointly, or plead alone, but both must join. 1 Nels. 558. If a man is bound to perform all the covenants in an indenture, and they are all in the affirmative, he may plead performance generally. Co. Lit. 303. Performance of covenants in the negative must be pleaded specially. Itid. 330. When some covenants are in the negative, and some in the affirmative, the defendant is to plead specially to the negative covenants that he had not done the thing. and performance generally as to the affirmative; and where the negative covenants are against law, and the affirmative agreeable to Moor, 856. If any of the covenants are in the disjunctive, so that it is in the election of the that it may appear what part hath been performed. Cro. Eliz. 23: 1 Nels. 573. And see I Will. Saund. 117. And commonly where an act is to be done, according to a covenant, he who pleads performance ought to do it specially. 1 Leon. 136.

In debt upon bond for performance of covenants, one for peaceable enjoyment, and free from all incumbrances, and another for farther assurance, &c., the defendant should plead specially, that the house was free from incumbrances at the time of the conveyance made, and not charged at any time since, and or such an assurance which he had executed. &c.; yet where a defendant pleaded generally, in this case it was held good. I Lutw. 603.

The plaintiff, in equity, if he has not performed his part of the agreement, must not having performed it, but must also allege that he is still ready to perform it: whereas, at law, if the covenants be not precedent, but not allege a performance of his covenants, to entitle him to recover against the defendant for a breach of his. Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 320: Nichols v. Raynbred, Hob. 88. But see Calonel v. Briggs, 1 Salk. 112: Goodison v. Nunn, 4 Term Rep. 761.

Where the covenants are mutual and distinet, the defendant cannot plead a breach by the plaintiff, in bar of the plaintiff's action may be unequal, and therefore each party the plaintiff shall have judgment for all that must recover against the other the damages are well assigned, for they are as several ache sustained. Cole v. Shallet, 3 Lev. 41: Thompson v. Noel, 1 Lev. 16: Howlett v. Strictland, Cowp. 56. But see Calonel v. Briggs, 1 Salk. 122: Goodison v. Nunn, 4 Term Rep. 761.

When a breach is assigned, it must not be general, but must be particular; as in action of covenant for not repairing of houses, the breach ought to be assigned particularly, what is the want of reparation. Cro. Jac. 369.

But on mutual promise for one to do an act, and in consideration thereof another to do some act, as to sell goods, &c. for so much money, a general breach that the defendant hath not performed his part, is well assigned. 3 Lev. 319.

Breaches assigned ought to be according to the very words of the condition or covenant; when they may be well enough, though too general. 1 Lutw. 326. But the covenant may be stated according to its legal effect, and then the breach may be so also.

Where a thing is to be done by a person or his assigns, the breach is to be, that it was not done either by the one or the other. 5 Mod. 133. If a person is to tender a conveyance, &c. to another, his heirs or assigns, breach assigned that the defendant did not tender a conveyance to the plaintiff, without the words, "his heirs or assigns," is good; but if the tender be to be made by another man, his heirs, &c., and not to him, it is otherwise. 1 Salk. 139.

A covenant not to assign, transfer, or set over, or otherwise do or put away the lease or premises, does not extend to an underlease for part of the term. 2 W. Black. 766. Such a covenant does not bind the assignee of the lessee. 5 Taunt. 795: S. C. 1 Marsh. 359. Letting lodgings is not a breach of a covenant not to underlet. 4 Campb. 77. A covenant that the lessee shall not exercise the trade of a butcher on the premises, is broken by his selling raw meat by retail, though no beasts are slaughtered. 1 B. & A. 117: and see 1 Maule & S. 95. A covenant that A. shall not exercise a particular trade, does not bind his executors. 2 W. Black. 856: S. C. 3 Wils. 380. Covenant by lessee that he will at all times during the time plough, sow, manure, and cultivate the demised premises (except the rabbit-warren and sheep-walk) in a due course of husbandry; held that ploughing the rabbit-warren or sheep-walk was a breach of covenant. St. Alban's D., v. Ellis,

When a lessee for years is to leave all the timber on the land, which was growing there at the time of the lease, and he cut down any trees, though he leaves the timber on the land at the end of his lease, this is a breach of covenant; for in contracts the intention of the parties is chiefly to be considered. Raym. 464. If several breaches are assigned, and the defendant demurs upon the whole declaration, tions. Cro. Jac. 557.

A lessor possessed of considerable freehold and leasehold property lying together, covenanted in a lease of parcel, that if he, his heirs, or assigns, should during the term have any advantageous offer for the disposing of a certain adjoining freehold parcel, he, the lessor, his heirs or assigns, should not dispose of the same without previously making an offer of that parcel to the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, at five per cent. less than that offer. The lessor sold his entire property, including the demised land and the adjoining parcel, for an entire consideration in one entire contract, without offering the parcel to the covenantor. Held that this was no breach of the covenant. Collinson v. Lettsom, 6 Taunt. 224.

Covenants are generally taken most strongly against the covenantor, and for the covenantee. Plowd. 287. But it is a rule in law, that where one thing may have several intendments, it shall be construed in the most favourable manner for the covenantor. 1 Lut. 490. The common use of covenants is for assuring of land, quiet enjoyment free from incumbrances, for payment of rent reserved, and concerning repairs, &c. And in deeds of covenant, sometimes a clause for performance, with a penalty, is inserted in the body of the deed: at other times, and more frequently, bonds for performance, with a sufficient penalty, are given separate; which last being sued, the jury must find the penalty; but on covenant, only the damages. Wood's Inst. 250. Vide the stat. 8 and 9 W. 3.c. 11. And vide ante and post, and tit. Bond.

Covenant for non-payment of rent was referred to the master as to the rent, and on payment thereof process to stay as to that; but there being another breach as to not repairing, the plaintiff might proceed for that. Anon. Wils. Rep. Par. 1. p. 75. In an action of covenant, it is not necessary to aver generally that the plaintiff performed his covenants. Joddrell v. Cowell, Rep. temp. Hardw. 343, 4. But if there is a condition precedent, performance of it must be specially shown.

By stat. 8 and 9 W. 3. c. 11. in actions on bonds, for performance of covenants, plaintiff may assign as many breaches as he pleases, and the jury, on the trial of the action, or on a writ of inquiry, may assess damages; on defendant's paying damages, execution may be stayed, but judgment shall remain to answer any farther breach, and plaintiff may have a scire facias against the defendant. See tit. Bond, VI.

"Where a penalty is intended merely to secure the enjoyment of a collateral object, the enjoyment of the object is considered as the principal intent of the deed, and the penalty only as accessional, and therefore only to secure the damage really incurred." Per Thurlow, C. Sloman v. Walter, 1 Bro. Rep. 418. And upon this construction of a penal- whatsoever, is not broken by the States of ty, courts of equity will interpose, to restrain proceedings at law to recover the penalty. But the principles of equal justice require that courts of equity should enforce the specific performance of the act agreed to be done, or restrain from the doing of that which was agreed should not be done. And upon this principle, wherever the primary object of the agreement be the securing of the specific subject of the covenant, the party covenanting is not entitled to elect whether he will perform his covenant or pay the penalty. See Hobson v. Trever, 2 P. Wms. 191: Parks v. Wilson, 10 Mod. 517: Chilliner v. Chilliner, 2 Vez. 528. But if the covenant be to do or not to do some particular act, or doing it or neglecting to do it, to pay a certain sum, by way of liquidated damages, courts of equity will not relieve against the payment of such damages. East India Company v. Bunt, Finche's Rep. 117: Ponsonby v. Adams, 2 East India Company v. Blake, Bro. P. C. 431: Rolfe v. Peterson, 2 Bro. P. C. 436 (8vo. ed.): Lowe v. Peers, 4 Burr. 2228. See also Small v. Lord Fitzwilliam, Pre. Ch. 102. And as courts of equity will not relieve against stipulated damages, they will not in general interpose to enforce the performance of the covenant, or to restrain its violation. Therefore, where the lessee covenanted not to plough certain land, or if he did to pay 20s. per acre per annum, the court refused to restrain the lessee from ploughing. Woodward v. Gyles, 2 Vern. 119. But there are some circumstances which will induce the court to interfere, though stipulated damages be reserved; as where the lessee had covenanted not to plough ancient meadow, or if he did to pay an increase of rent, the court, upon his threatening to plough, appears to have granted an injunction. Webb v. Clarke, 8th of May, 1782. See also Dulwich College v. Davis, M. 1787.

Where there is a covenant to pay a sum for liquidated damages on breach of the agreement, there is no exact rule as to where it is to be held a penalty for securing damage actually sustained, and where it is to be held liquidated damages. It seems that where a larger sum is to secure a smaller, the larger sum is regarded as a penalty. Astley v. Weldon, 2 Bos. & Pull. 346. And Bayley, J., said where the sum fixed on will in case of breaches of agreement, be in some instances too large, and in others too small, a compensation for the injury thereby occasioned, that sum is to be considered a penalty. 6 Barn. & Cres. 223. And see Holt's Ca. 43: 1 Bing. R. 302: 1 Moo. & Malk. 41. The question depends on the whole of the words of the instrument taken together.

A covenant in a conveyance of lands in America, during the time of the rebellion in that country, that the grantor had a legal title, and that the grantee might peaceably enjoy without the let, interruption, &c. of the grantor and his heirs, or of any other person America seizing the lands as forfeited, for an act done previous to the conveyance. 3 T. R.

It is held an action of covenant may be laid in London for non-payment of rent on a lease of lands in any other place. 1 Sid. 401. The action of covenant between lessor and lessee, or between the assignee of the lessor and the lessee, is founded in priority of contract, and may be laid in any county; but between the lessor and the assignee of the lessee it is local, and must be laid in the county where the premises are situate. 1 Will. Saund. 241. c. d. And if in this action a sum be miscast, either too little or too much, it is amendable. In action of covenant, the plaintiff must have recourse to the deeds or writings, and the circumstances of time, place, &c., and take notice what particular covenant in deed it is best to insist upon, to lay a breach right, &c. The words of covenanting are, covenant, grant, promise, and agree, &c.; but there needs no great exactness in words to make a covenant. See tit. Bonds, Leases, Agreements, Conveyances, &c., and ante, I.

COVENANT TO STAND SEISED TO USES, is when a man that hath a wife, children, brother, sister, or kindred, doth by covenant in writing, under hand and seal, agree that for their, or any of their provision or preferment, he and his heirs will stand seised of land to their use, either in fee simple, fee tail, or for life. The use being created by the stat. 27 H. 8. c. 10. which conveyeth the estate as the uses are directed, this covenant to stand seised is become a conveyance of the land since the said statute. The considerations of these deeds as in tural affection, in ringe, &c., and the law allows, in such cases, consideration of blood and marriage to raise uses, as well as money, and other valuable considcration, when a use is to a stranger. Plowd. 302. There are no considerations now to raise uses upon covenants to stand seised but natural love and affection, which is for advancement of blood; and consideration of marriage, which is the joining of the blood and marriage together: other considerations, as money, &c. for land, though the words in the deeds are stand seised, yet they are bargains and sales, and without enrolment they raise no use. Carter, 138: Lil. Abr. 353.

The usual covenant to stand seised to uses need not be by deed indented and inrolled. And where a man limits his estate to the use of his wife for life, this imports a sufficient consideration in itself; also if a person cove-nants to stand seised to the use of his wife, son, or cousin, it will raise an use without any express words of consideration; for sufficient consideration appears. 7 Rep. 40.

In case of a covenant to stand seised, so much of the use as the owner doth not dispose of remains still in him. 1 Vent. 374. and after grant another lease to another bona And where a use is raised by way of covenant, fide, but without any fine or rent; in this the covenantor continues in possession; and there the uses limited, if they are according to law, shall rise and draw the possession out of him: but if they are not, the possession shall remain in him until a lawful use ariseth.

1 Leon. 197: 1 Mod. 159, 160.

If on a covenant to stand seised to uses, no use doth arise, yet it may be good by way of covenant, and give remedy to the covenantee in an action; as if the covenant be future, that, in consideration of a marriage, lands shall descend or remain to a son and the heirs of his body on the body of his wife; in this! case the covenantee may have writ of covenant upon the covenant against the covenantor. But if a covenant be, that a man and his heirs shall from henceforth stand and be seised to such and such uses, and the uses will not arise by law: here no action of covenant lies on the covenant, for this action will never lie upon any covenant, but such as is either to do a thing hereafter, or where the thing is already done, and not where it is for !

COVERTURE, Fr.] Any thing that covers, as apparel, a coverlet, &c.; but it is by our law particularly applied to the state and condition of a married woman, who is sub potestate viri, and therefore disabled to contract with any, to the damage of herself or husband, without his consent and privity, or his allow once and confirmation thereof. Bract. lib. 1. c. 10. lib. 2. 15. &c. Bro. Abr. When a woman is married, she is called a feme covert; and whatever is done concerning her during the marriage is said to be during the coverture: all things that are the wife's are the husband's, nor hath the wife power over herself, but the husband; and if the husband alien the wife's land during the coverture, she cannot avoid it during his life; but after his death she may recover by cui in vita. Terms de la Ley. See tits. Baron and Feme; Cui in Vita.

COVIN, covina.] A deceitful compact between two or more to deceive or prejudice others; as if tenant for life or in tail conspires with another, that he shall recover the land in reversion. Plowd. 546. Covin is commonly conversant in and about conveyances of lands by fine, feoffment, recovery, &c. And then it tends to defeat purchasers of the lands they purchase, and creditors of their just debts; and so it is used in deeds of girt of goods: it may be likewise sometimes in suits of law, and judgments had in them. But wherever covin is, it shall never be intended unless it appears, and be particularly found; for covin and fraud, though proved, yet must be found by the jury, or it will not be good.

If one make a lease to a person by covin, case the second lessee may not avoid the first lease, because he is not a purchaser that comes in for money. 3 Rep. 83. On recovery by a good title, there may be covin; as where tenant for life by assent, &c., suffers a recovery by nil dicit, without making any defence; and if a man hath a rightful and just cause of action, and of covin and consent, shall raise up a tenant by wrong against whom he may recover; the covin doth so suffocate the right, that the recovery, although it be upon good title, shall not bind. Bro. Covin, 47: Co. Lit. 357: 1 Shep. Abr. 365. A. is tenant for life, remainder in tail to B., and a præcipe is brought against them as joint tenants, by covin, between the demandant and A., and an answer procured for B. as joint tenant, and they join the mise (or issue); and after make default, whereby final judgment is given; this shall not defeat the estate of B, who may bring a writ of disceit, and shall be restored to land. Rol. Abr. 621.

If a man that has a right to certain lands, by covin causes another to oust the tenant of Br. 111. And in the stat. 1 Ed. 3.c. 4. See the land, to the intent to recover it from him, and he recovers accordingly against him by action tried; yet he shall not be remitted to his ancient right; but is in, of the estate of him who made the ouster; and an assise lies against him. 2 Danv. Abr. 309. Land is aliened, pending a writ of debt, by covin, to avoid the extent thereof for the debt; the land so aliened shall be extended when the covin appears upon the return of the elegit by the sheriff. Ibid. 311. If a man makes a deed of gift, &c., of his goods in his lifetime by covin, to oust his creditors of their debts. after his death the donee or vendee shall be charged for them. See the several stats. of Frauds. If goods are sold in market overt by covin, on purpose to bar him that hath right, this shall not bar him thereof. 2 Inst. 713. See tit. Frauds, &c.

COUNCIL. See tit. Privy Council.

In the city of London there is a common council, consisting of members called common councilmen, chosen in every ward at a court of wardmote, held by the aldermen of the respective wards on St. Thomas's day yearly; they are so chosen out of the most sufficient men, and sworn to give true counsel for the common profit of the city, &c. Lex Londi. num, 117. In the court of common council are made laws for advancement of trade, and committees yearly appointed, &c.; but acts made by them are to have the assent of the lord mayor and aldermen, by stat. 21 G. 1. c. 11. COUNTEE, Fr. comte.] The most eminent dignity of a subject before the Conquest, and those who in ancient times were created countees were men of great estate; for which reason, and because the law intends that they assist the king with their counsel for the public good, and preserve the realm by their valour, they had great privileges; as they might not be arrested for debt or trespass, or be put on juries, &c. Of old the countee was præfectus, or præpositus comitatûs, and had the charge and custody of the county: but this authority the sheriff now hath. 9

COUNTERMAND, contramandatum.] Is where a thing formerly executed is afterwards, by some act or ceremony, made void by the party that first did it; and it is either actual by deed or implied. Actual, where a power to execute any authority, &c. is by a formal writing, for that very purpose, put off for a time, or made void; and implied, is where a man makes his last will and testament, and thereby devises his land to A. B.: land, here this feoffment is a countermand to the will, without any express words for the same, and the will is void as to the disposition of the land. Also if a woman, seised of land in fee-simple, makes a will, and deviseth the same to C. D. and his heirs, if he survive her; and after she intermarries with the said C. D., there, by taking him to husband, and coverture at the time of her death, the will is countermanded. Terms de la Ley. But if a woman makes a lease at will, and then marries, this marriage is no countermand to the lease, without express matter done by the husband to determine the will. If a woman submits differences to arbitration, and then marries, the marriage countermands the authority of the arbitrator. Charnley v. Winstanley, 5 East, 266.

Where land is devised, and after a lease made thereof for years only, it shall not be a countermand of the will, which is good notwithstanding, for the reversion after the lease for years is ended; but in case a man have a lease for years, and gives it by his will, and after surrenders it, it is a countermand of the Dyer. 47: Goldsb. 93. See tit. Devise. If a copyholder, like to die, do surrender his estate to the use of his wife or children, without any consideration of money, &c., and he recover before the presentment and admittance, it may be countermanded; it is otherwise if it be to the use of a stranger. Kitch. 82. If there be a feoffment, with letter of attorney to make livery and seisin, and before it is made the feoffor makes a feoffment or bargain and sale Rep. 46. A countee or count is an earl. COUNTENANCE. This word seems to the letter of attorney. 2 Brownl. 291. A perbe used for credit or estimation. Old. Nat. son may countermand his command, authority, licence &c., before the thing is done; and if he dies it is countermanded. There is also a countermand of notice of trial, &c., in law proceedings. See tits. Trial, Process.

COUNTERPART. When the several parts of an indenture are interchangeably executed by the several parties, that part or copy which is executed by the grantor is usually called the original, and the rest are counterparts; though of late it is most frequent (and better) for all the parties to execute every part, which renders them all originals. 2 Comm. 296. See tit. Deeds.

COUNTERPLEA, is when the tenant in any real action, tenant by the curtesy, or dower, in his answer and plea, vouches any one to warrant his title, or prays in aid of another who hath a larger estate; as of him in reversion, &c.: or where one that is a stranger to the action comes and prays to be received to save his estate; then that which the demandant allegeth against it, why he should not be admitted, is called a counterplea; in which sense it is used stat. 25 Ed. 3. c. 7. So that counterplea is in law a replication to Aid Prier, and is called counterplea to the voucher. But when the voucher is allowed, and the vouchee comes and demands what cause the tenant hath to vouch him, and the tenant shows his cause, whereupon the vouchee pleads any thing to avoid the warranty, that is termed a counterplea of the warranty. Terms de la Ley; stat. 3 Ed. 1. c. 39. There is also a counterplea to the plea of clergy.

See tit. Clergy, Benefit of, II.

COUNTORS, Fr. Contours.] Have been taken for such serjeants at law which a man retains to defend his cause, and speak for him in any court, for their fees. Horn's Mirror, lib. 2. And as in the Court of C. B. none but serjeants at law may plead, they were anciently called Serjeant counters. 1 Inst. 17.

COUNTY. Comitatus.] Signifies the same with shire, the one coming from the French, the other from the Saxon. It contains a circuit or portion of the realm, into which the whole land is divided, for the better government of it, and the more easy administration of justice: so that there is no part of this kingdom that lies not within some county; and every county is governed by a yearly officer, the sheriff. Fortescue, cap. 24. Of these counties, the numbers have been different at different times; there are now in England forty, besides twelve in Wales, making in all fifty-two. It seems that this division of the kingdom was made by King Alfred. See 4 Comm. 410. The names of the counties are as follows. In England; Bedford, Berks, Bucks, Cambridge, Chester, Cornwall, Cumberland, Derby, Devon, Dorset, Durham, Essex, Gloucester, Hereford, Hertford, Huntingdon, Kent, Lancaster, Leicester, Lincoln, Middlesex, Monmouth, Norfolk, Northampton, Northumberland, Nottingham, Oxford, Rutland, (the smallest), Salop (commonly called Shropshire), Somerset, Stafford, Suffolk, Surry, Sussex, Southampton (Hants or Hampshire), Warwick, Westmorland, Worcester, Wilks, York (the largest):—In North Walles, Anglesea, Caernarvon, Denbigh, Flint, Merioneth, and Montgomery:—In South Walles, Brecknock, Cardigan, Caermarthen, Glamorgan, Pembroke and Radnor.

As to the divisions of many of these counties for the purposes of representation, see the Boundary Act, 2 and 3 W. 4 c. 64. and see tit. Parliament: and as to divisions of counties with reference to quarter and petty sessions, see 9 G. 4. c. 43: 10 G. 4. c. 46.

Three of the counties above enumerated, viz. Chester, Durham, and Lancaster, are called Counties Palatine. The two former are such by prescription or immemorial custom; or at least as old as the Norman conquest (Seld. tit. Hon. 2. 5. 8.); the latter was created by King Edward III. in favour of Henry Plantagenet, first Earl, and then Duke of Lancaster (4 Inst. 204.), whose heiress being married to John of Gaunt, the king's son, the franchise was greatly enlarged and confirmed in parliament to honour John of Gaunt himself, whom, on the death of his father-in-law, the King had also created Duke of Lancaster. Plowd. 215: T. Raym. 138.

Counties Palatine are so called a palatio: because the owners thereof, the Earl of Chester, the Bishop of Durham, and the Duke of Lancaster, had in those counties jura regalia as fully as the king hath in his palace: regalem potestatem in omnibus, as Bracton expresses it. Lib. 3. c. 8. § 4. They might pardon treasons, murders, and felonies; they appointed all judges and justices of the peace; all writs and indictments ran in their names, as in other counties in the king's, and all offences were said to be done against their peace, and not, as in other places, contra pacem domini regis. 4 Inst. 204. And indeed by the ancient law, in all peculiar jurisdictions, offences were said to be done against his peace, in whose court they were tried; in a court-leet, contra pacem domini: in the court of a corporation, contra pacem ballivorum; in the sheriff's courts or towns, contra pacem vice-comitis. Seld. in Heng. Magnu,

The Palatine privileges (so similar to the regal independent jurisdictions usurped by the great barons on the continent, during the weak and infant state of the first feodal kingdoms in Europe) were in all probability originally granted to the counties of Chester and Durham, because they bordered upon inimical countries, Wales and Scotland: in order that the inhabitants, having justice administered at home, might not be obliged to go out of the country, and leave it open to the enemy's incursions: and the owners being encouraged by so large an authority might be the more watchful in its defence. And upon this | condition, separate from the crown of Engaccount also there were formerly two other counties palatine, Pembrokeshire and Hexhamshire; the latter now united with Northumberland; but these were abolished by parliament, the former in 27 H. 8. the latter in 14. Eliz. And in the time of Hen. VIII. likewise, the powers beforementioned of owners of Counties Palatine were abridged; stat. 27 H. 8. c. 24; the reason for their continuance in a manner ceasing, though still all writs are witnessed in their names, and all forfeitures for treason by the common law accrue to them. 4 Inst. 205.

Of these three, the county of Durham is now the only one remaining in the hands of a subject. For the earldom of Chester, as Camden testifies, was united to the crown by Hen. III., and has ever since given title to the king's eldest son. And the County Palatine, or Duchy of Lancaster, was the property of Henry Bolingbroke, the son of John of Gaunt, at the time when he wrested the crown from King Richard II. and assumed the title of King Henry IV. But he was too prudent to suffer this to be united to the crown; lest if he lost one, he should lose the other also. For as Plowden (215.) and Sir Edward Coke (4 Inst. 245.) observe, "he knew he had the Duchy of Lancaster by sure and indefeasible title, but that his title to the crown was not so assured; for that after the decease of Richard II. the right of the crown was in the heir of Lionel Duke of Clarence, second son of Edward III., John of Gaunt, father to this Henry IV., being but the fourth son." And therefore he procured an act of parliament, in the first year of his reign, ordaining that the Duchy of Lancaster, and all other his hereditary estates, with all their royalties, and' franchises, should remain to him and his heirs for ever: and should remain, descend, be administered, and governed, in like manner as if he never had attained the regal dignity; and thus they descended to his son and grand-son, Henry V. and Henry VI., many new territories, and privileges, being annexed to the duchy by the former. Parl. 2 H. 5. n. 30: 3 H. 5. n. 15.—Henry VI. being attainted in 1 Edward IV. this duchy was declared in parliament to have become forfeited to the crown (1 Ventr. 155.); and at the same time an act was made to incorporate the Duchy of Lancaster, to continue the County Palatine (which might otherwise have determined by the attainder; 1 Ventr. 157.); and to make the same parcel of the duchy: and farther, to vest the whole in King Edward IV. and his heirs, Kings of England, for ever; but under a separate guiding and governance from the other inheritances of the crown. And in 1 Hen. VII. another act was made to resume such part of the duchy lands as had been dismembered from it in the reign of Edward IV., and to vest the inheritance of the whole in the king and his heirs for ever; as amply and largely, and in like manner, form, and land and possession of the same, as the three Henry and Edward IV. or any of them, had and held the same.

The Isle of Ely is not a County Palatine, though sometimes erroneously called so, but only a royal franchise, the bishop having, by grant of King Henry the First, jura regalia within the Isle of Ely; whereby he exercises a jurisdiction over all causes, as well criminal as civil. 2 Inst. 220: and see 3 East,

The Counties Palatine are reckoned among the superior courts: and are privileged as to pleas, so as no inhabitant of such counties shall be compelled by any writ to appear or answer out of the same; except for error, and in case of treason, &c.; and the Counties Palatine of Chester and Durham are by prescription, where the king's writ ought not to come, but under the seal of the Counties Palatine; unless it be writs of proclamation. Counties Corporate, are certain cities and towns, some with more, some with less territory annexed to them, to which, out of special grace and favour, the kings of England have granted the privilege to be counties of themselves, and not to be comprised in any other county; but to be governed by their own sheriffs and other magistrates, so that no officers of the county at large have any power to intermeddle therein.

The stat. 3 G. 1. c. 15. for the regulation of the office of sheriffs, enumerates twelve cities and five towns, which are counties of themselves, and which have consequently their own sheriffs. The cities are London, (by grant of Hen. 1.) [See 2 Inst. 230, that it is a corporatioon by prescription.—The office of sheriff of London, &c. is always united with that of Middlesex. See 2 Inst. 248.] Chester (42 Eliz.), Bristol, Coventry, Canterbury, Exeter, Gloucester, Litchfield, Lincoln, Norwich, Worcester, York (32 Hen. 8.) The towns are, Kingston-upon-Hull, Nottingham, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Pool, Southampton. 1 Comm. 116. 119. To these Cirencester is added in Impey's Sheriff; but, on what authority does not clearly appear. By the Reform Act, 2 W. 4. c. 45. thirteen cities and towns, which are counties of themselves, are, for the purposes of representation, for the plaintiff, judgment is entered, and a included in the adjoining counties. See | fieri facias may be awarded against the de-Schedule G. of the Act.

COUNTY COURT, caria comitatus.] Is tion of Saxon words, and divided into two sorts; one retaining the general name, as the county court held every month, by the sheriff or his deputy; the other called the turn, held twice in every year, viz. within a month after Easter and Michaelmas; of both which see Cromp. Jurisd. fol. 241. All administration of justice was at first in the king's hands; but afterwards, when by the increase of the people the burden grew too great for him, as the Lingdom was divided into counties, huncreds, &c., so the administration of justice was distributed amongst divers courts, of which the sheriff had the county court for government of the county, and lords of liberties had their lects and law-days, for the speeding and easier administering justice

Before the courts at Westminister were erected, the county courts were the chief courts of the kingdom; and among the laws of kin Eurer it is organia d, that there be two county courts kept in the year, in which there shall be a bishop and an alderman, or earl, as judges; one to judge according to the common law, and the other according to the ecclesiastical law; but these united powers of a bishop and earl to try causes were separated by William the First, called the Conqueror; and soon after the business of ecclesiastical cognisance was brought into its proper courts, and the common law business

That the county court, in ancient times, had the cognisance of pleas of the crown, indictments of felony, &c. appears by Glanv. lib. 1. c. 2, 3, 4; by Bracton and B. itton, in divers places; and Fleta, lib. 2. c. 62. But the power of this court was much reduced by Magn. Chart. c. 17; and by 1 Ed. 4. c. 2. by the former of which it is expressly provided, that " no sheriff shall hold pleas of the crown." It had formerly, and now hath, the determination of certain debts, &c. under 40s. Over some of which causes the inferior courts have by the express words of the stat. of Gloucester, 6 Ed. 1. c. 8. a jurisdiction totally exclusive of the king's superior courts.

This court may also hold plea of many of ward. 4 Inst. 266; 3 Inst. 312. And of all personal actions to any amount, by virtue of a writ of justices, which is in nature of a commission to the sheriff to do it. 4 Inst. 266. Here the plaintiff takes out a summons, and if the defendant do not appear, an attachment or distringas is to be made out against him; but if the defendant appears, the plaintiff is to file his declaration, and after the defendant is to put in his answer or plea; and the plaintiff having joined issue, the trial proceeds, &c.; whereupon if verdict is given fendant's goods, which may be taken by virtue thereof, and be appraised and sold to satisfy the plaintiff. But if the defendant hath no goods, the plaintiff is without remedy in this court; for no capias lies therein, but an action may be brought at common law, upon the judgment entered. Greenwood of Courts, p. 22: Finch, 318: F. N. B. 152.

No sheriff is to enter in the county court any plaint in the absence of the plaintiff; nor above one plaint for one cause, under penalties. The defendant in the county court is to have lawful summons; and two justices of peace are to view the estreats of sheriffs, before they issue them out of the county court, &c. By stat. 11 H. 7. c. 15. causes are to be removed out of the county court, by recordare, pone, and writ of false judgment into B. R. &c. The stats. 9 H. 5. c. 35. 2 E. 6. c. 25. enact, that no county court shall be adjourned for longer than one month, consisting of 28 days.

All popular elections which the freeholders are to make, as formerly of sheriffs and conservators of the peace, and still of coroners, verderors, and knights of the shire, must ever be made in full county court.

As this court hath of ancient times belonged to the sheriff, and is incident to his office, the king cannot grant by letters patent the office of county clerk, nor the fees; but it of right belongs to the sheriff. 4 Co. Mitton's case.

See stats. 7 & 8 W. 3. c. 25. as to the county courts in Yorkshire, and 27 H. 8. c. 26; 34 H. 8. c. 26. as to those in Wales. Blackstone (3 Comm. 82.) observes, on the late erection of numerous courts of conscience (see that tit. post) that it is to be wished that the proceedings in the county and hundred courts should be again revived and improved, an experiment that has been tried, and succeeded, in Middlesex. For by stat. 23 G. 2. c. 33. it is enacted—1. That a special county court shall be held, at least once a month, in every hundred of the county of Middlesex, by the county clerk. 2. That twelve freeholders of that hundred, qualified to serve on juries, and struck by the sheriff, shall be summoned to appear at such court by rotation; so as none shall be summoned oftener than once a year. 3. That in all causes not exceeding the value of 40s. the county clerk and twelve suitors shall proceed in a summary way, examining the parties and witnesses, on oath, without the formal process anciently used; and shall make such order therein as they shall judge to be agreeable to conscience. 4. That no plaints shall be removed out of this court by any process whatever, but the determination herein shall be final. 5. That if any action be brought in any of the superior courts, against a person resident in Middlesex, where the jury shall find less than 40s. damages, the plaintiff shall not recover, but pay, costs. (See Blackstone remarks, that this plan wants only to be generally known, to secure its universal reception. See tit. Courts of Conscience.

COUNTY RATES. By stat. 12 G. 2. c. 29. justices of peace at their quarter sessions (and by stat. 13 G. 2. c. 18. justices of liberties and franchises not subject to the county commissioners) may make one general rate, to answer all former distinct rates, which shall be assessed on every parish, &c., and collected and paid by the high constables of hundreds to treasurers appointed by the justices; which money shall be deemed the publie stock, and be laid out in repairing of bridges, gaols, or houses of correction, on presentment made by the grand jury at the assizes or quarter sessions, of their wanting reparation; but appeal lies by the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parishes to the justices at the next sessions, against the rute on any particular parish. And as to this appeal, see also stat. 22 G. 3.

The stat. 18 G. 3. c. 19. which enables the court in certain cases to make an order on the treasurer of the county, riding, or division, where the offence was committed, to pay the prosecutor and his witnesses their expenses, extends to inferior districts, having jurisdiction to try felons, and raising their own rates similar to county rates. 6 T. Rep. 237.

Where, before the stat. 12 G. 3. c. 29. the county rates had been assessed upon the district or place of H. within C., but the two townships of H. and C. separately maintained their own poor, and were used to contribute towards the county rates in certain fixed proportions between themselves; yet, as that statute only establishes the accustomed proportions of contribution to the county rates, as between the entire districts which were before assessed to such rates, within the limits of the respective counties, &c., and does not meddle with the proportions which had been used to be observed as between the subdivisions of those districts, this case was held to fall within § 3. of the statute, which provides that where there is no poor's rate in the parish, township or place, assessed to the county rates (by which must be understood no entire poor's rate co-extensive with the place or district assessed to the county rates,) the county rates shall be raised by the petty constables, in such manner as by law the poor's rate is to be assessed and levied, that is, by an equal rate on all the inhabitants, &c. R. v. Yorkshire, W. R. Justices, 13 East's Rep. 117.

A charter granting jurisdiction to borough justices over a district not within the borough, without words of exclusive jurisdiction, was held not to exclude the county justices from rating the district to a county rate. Bates v. Winstanley, 4 Maule & S. 429.

By stat. 52 G. 3. c. 110. for amending 12

G. 2. c. 29. and remedying defects in the laws relative to the repairing of county bridges, &c. the quarter sessions are empowered to appoint, annually at Easter, &c. two or more justices to superintend the occasional repairs of bridges; who may order any expenditure not exceeding 201. for such repairs, which shall be paid by the sessions on certificate of the justices. Justices at sessions may contract with commissioners of turnpike-roads for repair of bridges, &c. for any term not exceeding seven years.

By stat. 43 G. 3. c. 59. amended by 54 G. 3. c. 90; 55 G. 3. c. 143. justices are empowered to purchase land, houses, &c. for the widening, altering, and improving of county bridges; and also of old bridges repaired by hundreds and general divisions of counties.

See farther tit. Bridges.

By stat. 55 G. 3. c. 51. additional provisions are made for the more equally and effectually making and levying the county rates .- By this act, justices in general, or quarter sessions, are empowered to make a fair and equal county rate in any county, whenever circumstances appear to require it.-For this purpose they may require churchwardens and overseers of the several parishes to make returns to the justices of the respective divisions in petty sessions, of the annual value of all rateable property, which such justices must certify to the quarter sessions, who may make the county rate thereon. By this act the treasurers of counties are required to publish an abstract of their receipts and expenditure yearly, as audited by the justices.—And the high-constable, employed in levying the rates, may be required by the quarter sessions to give security; and if he fails, the rates shall be paid directly to the treasurer.

The first section of this act is confined to franchises having a separate jurisdiction co-extensive with that possessed by the county justices; and, therefore, when the justices of a city had no jurisdiction by charter to try felons, it was held that such city was liable to the county rate. 5 B. & A. 665.

A high constable may be appointed, and a county rate levied de novo, for a town erected into a county of itself by charter many years before, though no such officer had been appointed or such rate levied before. 6 T. R. 228.

In what cases the sessions have power to order the expense of certain litigations to be paid out of the county rates. See 4 T. R. 491, 4, 5, 6: 7 T. R. 377: 1 B. & A. 312: 2 B.

& A. 522. By 55 G. 3. c. 51. an appeal is given against a county rate made in fixed proportions invariably adopted for a series of years. 2 Barn. & C. 771. As to the notice of appeal against a county rate, see 10 B. & C. 226.

By stat. 56 G. 3. c. 49. extra-parochial places are made rateable, and the sessions are empowered to ascertain boundaries, &c.—

Stat. 57 G. 3. c. 94. regulates the mode of appeal against rates, which are to remain in force until quashed on such appeal, &c.

By the 4 and 5 W. 4. c. 48. all business relating to the assessment and application of county rates shall be transacted at the quarter sessions in open court; and two weeks' notice shall be given, by advertisement in two county papers, of the time of holding such sessions, and of the day and hour when such business will be transacted.

Several local acts have been passed for regulating the county rates in particular counties.

COURTS.—A COURT, Curia.] The king's palace or mansion; but more especially the place where justice is judicially administered. Co. Lit. 58. The superior courts are those at Westminster; and of courts, some are of record, and some not; which are accounted base courts, in respect of the rest.

A court of record is that court which hath power to hold plea, according to the course of the common law, of real, personal, and mixed actions, where the debt or damage is 40s. or above; as the King's Bench, Common Pleas, &cc. A court not of record is where it cannot hold plea of debt or damages amounting to 40s., but of pleas under that sum: or where the proceedings are not according to the course of the common law, nor inrolled, as the county-court, and the court-baron, &c. 1 Inst. 117. 260: 4 Rep. 52: 2 Rol. Abr. 574. See Record.

Every court of record is the king's court, in right of his crown and dignity, though his subjects have the benefit of it; and therefore no other court hath authority to fine and imprison: so that the very erection of a new jurisdiction, with power of fine or imprisonment, makes it instantly a court of record. Salk. 200: 12 Mod. 388: Finch. L. 231. The free use of all courts of record and not of record is to be granted to the people: the leet and tourn are the king's courts, and of record. 2 Danv. 259. The rolls of the superior courts of record are of such authority, that no proof will be admitted against them; and these records are only triable by themselves. 3 Inst. 71. But as the county-court, judges who give the judgment, and any officer court-baron, &c. are not courts of record, the proceedings therein may be denied, and tried by a jury; and upon their judgments a writ of error lies not, but writ of false judgment. 1 Inst. 117. See post, Court-Baron, Record.

In the courts at Westminster the plaintiff need not show at large in his declaration that the cause of action arises within their jurisdiction, it being general: inferior courts are to show it at large, because they have particular jurisdiction. 1 Lil. Abr. 371. Also nothing shall be intended to be within the jurisdiction of an inferior court, but what is expressly so alleged: and if part of the cause arises within the inferior jurisdiction, and part thereof without it, the inferior court ought not to hold plea. 1 Lev. 104: 2 Rep. 16. See tit. Abatement, I. 1.

An inferior court, not of record, cannot impose a fine, or imprison: but the courts of record at Westminster may fine, imprison,

The king, being the supreme magistrate of the kingdom, and intrusted with the execu-tive power of the law, all courts superior or inferior, ought to derive their authority from the crown: Staundf. 54; though the king himself cannot now, as anciently, sit in judgment in any court upon civil causes, nor upon indictments, because there he is one of the parties to be suit. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 1. § 1, 2. The king hath committed all his power judicial to one court or the other. 4 Inst. 71. And by stat. 52 H. 3. c. 1. it is enacted, that all persons shall receive justice in the king's courts, and none take any distress, &c. of his own authority, without award of the king's courts.

It is said the customs, precedents, and common judicial proceedings of a court, are a law to that court; and the determinations of courts make points to be law. 2 Rep. 12: 4 Rep. 53: Hob. 298. All things determinable in courts, that are courts by the common law, shall be determined by the judges of the same courts; and the king's writ cannot alter the jurisdiction of a court. 6 Rep. 11. The court of B. R. regulates all the inferior courts of law in the kingdom, so that they do not exceed their jurisdictions, nor alter their forms, &c. And as the Court of King's Bench hath a general superintendency over all inferior courts, it may award an attachment against any such court usurping a jurisdiction not belonging to it: but it is sometimes usual first to award a writ of prohibition, and afterwards an attachment, upon its continuing to proceed. 2 Hawk. Judges of inferior courts may be punished for misbehaviour either by information or attachment. Moravia's case, Hardw. 135. Any defects in the proceedings of an inferior court cannot be amended by the return, which is not part of the record. The King v. Holmes, Id. 365. Where an inferior court returns its proceedings, no diminution can be alleged.

Action on the case lies against the plaintiff for suing one in an inferior court, where the cause of action is out of its jurisdiction. 1 Vent. 369. And if a plaintiff on a contract for a large sum, splits it into several actions for small sums to give an inferior court jurisdiction, a prohibition shall go. Mod. Cas. 90. A. became indebted to B. in a sum not exceeding 40s. for the carriage of parcels, and in a month after incurred another debt to B. for the carriage of another parcel. A. brought two actions in the county court for the respective debts. It was held that the causes of action were distinct, and that A. was entitled to sue separately for each debt, and the court refused a prohibition. 1 Barn. & Adol. 672.

COURT BARON, Curia Baronis.] A court which every lord of a manor hath within his own precinct; it is an inseparable incident to the manor: and must be held by prescription. for it cannot be created at this day. 1 Inst. 58: 4 Inst. 268. The freeholders' court, whose most important business is to determine, by writ of right, all controversies relating to lands within the manor, and which hath also jurisdiction for trying actions of debt, trespasses, &c. under 40s. may be held every three weeks, and is something like a county court, and the proceedings much the same: though on recovery of debt, they have not power to make execution, but are to distrain the defendant's goods, and retain them till satisfaction is made. See 5 Barn. & A. 691.

The proceedings on a writ of right may be removed into the county courts by a precept from the sheriff called a tolt (quia tollit causam). 3 Rep. Pref. And the proceedings in all other actions may be removed into the superior courts by the king's writs of pone, or accedas ad curium, according to the nature of

After judgment given also, a writ of false judgment lies to the courts at Westminster to re-hear and re-view the cause: and not a writ of error; for this is not a court of record : and therefore in some of these writs of removal, the first direction given is to cause the plaint to be recorded; recordari facias loquelam. F.

The other court baron, for taking and passing of estates, surrenders, admittances, &c., is held but once or twice in a year (usually with the court leet), unless it be on purpose to grant an estate; and then it is holden as often as requisite. COURT OF CHIVALRY, Curia Militaris.] Otherwise called the marshal court, the judges of it are the lord high constable of England, and the earl marshal; this court is said to be the fountain of the martial law, and the earl marshal hath both a judicial and ministerial power; for he is not only one of the judges, but is to see execution done. 4 Inst. 123. See tit. Court Martial.

The court of chivalry is the only court military known to, and established by, the permanent laws of the land; it was formerly held before the lord high constable and earl marshal of England, jointly: but since the extinguishment of the former office, it hath usually, with respect to civil matters, been before the earl marshal only. See tit. Constable.-From the sentence of this court an appeal lies immediately to the king in person. 4 Inst. 125. This court was in great reputation in times of pure chivalry, and afterwards, during our connections with the Continent, by the territories which our princes held in France; but it is now grown almost entirely out of use, on account of the feebleness of its jurisdiction, and want of power to enforce its judgments. 3 Comm. 68.

The jurisdiction of this court is declared by stat. 13 R. 2. c. 2. to be this: "that it hath cognizance of contracts touching deeds of arms, or of war, out of the realm; and also of things which touch war within the realm, which cannot be determined or discussed by the common law; together with other usages and customs to the same matters appertaining." So that wherever the common law can give redress, this court hath no jurisdiction; which has thrown it entirely out of use, as to matters of contract, all such being usually cognizable in the courts of Westminster-hall, if not directly, at least by fiction of law: as if a contract be made at Gibraltar, the plaintiff may suppose it made at Westminster, &c.; for the locality or place of making it, is of no consequence with regard to the validity of the

The words, "other usages and customs," support the claim of this court. 1. To give relief to such of the nobility and gentry as think themselves aggrieved in matters of honour; and 2. To keep up the distinction of degrees and quality. Whence it follows, that the civil jurisdiction of this court of chivalry is principally in two points; the redressing injuries of honour, and correcting encroachments in matters of coat-armour, precedency and other distinctions of families.

As a court of honour, it is to give satisfaction to all such as are aggrieved in that point, a point of a nature so nice and so delicate, descents, and coat-armour), that though forthat its wrongs and injuries escape the notice merly some credit has been paid to their of the common law, and yet are fit to be re- testimony, now even their common seal will dressed somewhere; such for instance as not be received as evidence in any court of calling a man coward, or giving him the lie; justice in the kingdom. 2 Roll. Abr. 686: 2 for which, as they are productive of no-immediate damage to his person or property, no compiled when progresses were solemnly and action will lie in the courts of Westminster; and yet they are such injuries as will prompt dom, to inquire into the state of families, and every man of spirit to demand some honourable amends, which by the ancient law of were verified to them upon oath, are allowed the land was appointed to be given in the court of chivalry. Year Book, 37 Hen. 6.21: Selden of Duels, c. 10: Hal. Hist. C. L. 37. But modern resolutions have determined, that sent lie therein. Salk. 583: 7 Mod. 125: 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 4. § 7, 8. And it hath always been most clearly holden (Hal. Hist. C. L. 37.), that as this court cannot model. how much soever such a jurisdiction may be 37.), that as this court cannot meddle with any thing determinable by the common law, it therefore can give no pecuniary satisfaction or damages, inasmuch as the quantity and determination thereof is ever of common law cognizance. And therefore this court of chivalry can at most only order reparation in point of honour; to compel the defendant mendacium sibi ipsi imponere, to take the lie he has given upon himself, or to make such other submission as the laws of honour may require. 1 Ro. Ab. 128. Neither can this court, as to the point of reparation in honour, hold a plea of any such word or thing wherein the party is relievable by the courts of common law. As if a man give another a blow, or call him thief or murderer; for in both these cases the common law has pointed out his proper remedy by action.

As to the other point of jurisdiction, the redressing of encroachments and usurpation in matters of heraldry and coat-armour; it is the business of this court, according to Sir Matthew Hale, to adjust the right of armorial ensigns, bearings, crests, supporters, pennons, &c., and also rights of place or precedence, where the king's patent or act of parliament (which cannot be over-ruled by this court) have not already determined it.

The proceedings in this court are by petition, in a summary way; and the trial not by a jury of twelve men, but by witnesses, or by combat. Co. Lit. 261. See tit. Battel. as it cannot imprison, not being a court of record, and as by the resolutions of the supeperior courts, it is now confined to so narrow and restrained a jurisdiction, it has fallen into contempt and disuse. The marshalling of coat-armour, which was formerly the pride and study of all the best families in the kingdom is now greatly disregarded; and has this court to make such orders between the fallen into the hands of certain officers and parties touching such debts, as they should attendants upon this court, called heralds, find stand to equity and good conscience, who consider it only as a matter of lucre, and The stat. 3 Jac. 1. c. 15. fully establishes not of justice; whereby such falsity and confusion have crept into their records, (which is by summons, to which if the party appear, ought to be the standing evidence of families,

But the general inconvenience, affecting mere private successions, still continues without a remedy. 3 Comm. 103-6.

COURTS OF CONSCIENCE, Curiæ Conscientiæ.] Courts for the recovery of small debts by summary process before commissioners appointed for that purpose. In the 9th year of King Henry VIII. the Court of Conscience or Court of Requests, in London, was erected: there was then made an act of common council, that the lord mayor and aldermen should assign monthly two aldermen and four discreet commoners, to be commissioners to sit in this court twice a week, to hear and determine all matters brought before them between party and party, between citizens and freemen of London, in all cases where the debt or damage was under 40s. And this act of common council was confirmed by stat. 1 Jac. 1 c. 14. which empowered the commissioners of amining the witnesses of both parties, or | ket gardener, who rented a stand with a shed the parties themselves on oath, and as they see cause, give judgment. And if the party summoned appear not, the commissioners may commit him to the compter prison till he does; also the commissioners have power to commit a person refusing to obey their orders, &c.

By stat. 14 G. 2. c. 10. the proceedings of the Court of Conscience are regulated; and in case any person affront or insult any of the commissioners, on their certifying it to the lord mayor, he shall punish the offender by fine, not exceeding 20s. or may imprison him ten days. See 25 G. 3. c. 45: 26 G. 3. Debtors.

By 39 and 40 G. 3. c. 104. (a local act) the acts 3 Jac. 1. c. 15. and 14 G. 2. c. 10. are explained and amended, and the jurisdiction of the London Court of Conscience extended to 5l. See 7 East, 47. 50: 14 E. R. 301.

There are some distinctions deserving notice between the former acts of parliament, for the recovery of small debts in London, and the 39 and 40 G. 3. c. 104. By the former acts the Courts of Requests had no jurisdiction in a suit, unless both the plaintiff and defendant were resident within the city. 2 H. Blac. 220. and see 5 Durnf. & East, 535, 6. (a.) 8: Moore, 429: 1 Bing. 388. S. C. But this is not necessary under the 39 and 40 G. 3. c. 104. which extends the jurisdiction of the court to debts not exceeding 5l. due to any person or persons, whether residing within the city or elsewhere. It is necessary, however, under the latter act, that the defendant should be a person residing or inhabiting within the city or its liberties, or keeping a house, &c., or seeking a livelihood there: and if a party's residence be out of the jurisdiction of the Court of Requests for London, his occasionally underwriting a policy at Lloyd's Coffee-house, where he has a seat, is not his seeking a livelihood within the city, so as to subject him to the jurisdiction of the court; it must be followed as a trade or business. 5 Esp. Rep. 19; and see 1 Smith R. 334. So where a defendant resided in Middlesex, and kept a warehouse in the city of London jointly with another person, but told the plaintiff that he did not keep the warehouse, and the plaintiff, upon inquiry in the neighbourhood where it was, could obtain no intelligence respecting him, the Court of Common Pleas would not, under the above act of parliament, exempt the defendant from paying costs on the ground of the verdict being under 51., and that he ought to have been summoned to the Court of Requests. 1 New. Rep. But where a person rented a counting house in the City of London, jointly with another person, and received orders there for his business, the Court of Common Pleas held that he was within the jurisdiction of the Court of Requests for the City of London, town and county of the town of Kingston-though he slept and resided in Southwark. 5 upon-Hull, by the 48 G. 3. c. 109. The Court af Requests for London having been found extremely beneficial, courts of a similar nature were established by act of parliament in various populous districts; as in the cities of Bristol and Gloucester, by 1 W. & M. sess. 1. c. 8: in the town and borough of Southwark, &c., by the 22 G. 2. c. 47: (explained and amended by the 32 G.2. c. 6.): 46 G. 3. c. 87: and 4 G. 4. c. 123. in the city and liberty of Westminster, and part of the Duchy of Lancaster, by the 23 G. 2. c. 27. (explained and amended by the 24 G. 2. c. 42.): in the Tower Hamlets, by the 23 G. 2. c. 30. explained and amended by the 19 G. 3. c. 68.); in the city of Lincoln, &c., by the 24 G. 2. c. 16; in the town of Birmingham, &c. by the 25 G. 2. c. 34; in the town and port of Liverpool, &c., by the 25 G. 2. c. 43: in the borough of Great Yarmouth by the 31 G. 2. c. 24; and in the town and county of the town of Kingston-upon-Hull, by the 2 G. 3. c. The county court of Middlesex was also put upon a different footing, by the 23 G. 2. c. 33. for the more easy and speedy recovery of small debts. For the fees of the county clerk of Middlesex, see 4 Dowl. & Ryl. 273; and for decisions on the above statute, see Pratt's Courts of Requests, 39, 40: 5 Barn. & Cres. 532: 8 Dowl. & Ryl. 155. S. C. And in the late reign the jurisdiction of these courts was in several instances extended to sums not exceeding five pounds; as in London, by the 39 and 40 G. 3. c. 104. before mentioned; in the Isle of Wight, by the 46 G. 3. c. 66: in the town and borough of Southwark, and the eastern half of the hundred of Brixton, by the 46 G. 3. c. 87. (but see the statute 4 G. 4. c. 123. § 12. &c.) in the western division of the same hundred, by 46 G. 3. c. 188; in the hundreds of Blackheath, Bromley, and Beckenham, &c., by the 47 G. 3. sess. 1. c. 4; in the town and port of Sandwich, and the vills of Ramsgate, &c., by the 47 G. 3. sess. 1 .c. 35; in the parishes of St. John the Baptist, &c. in the Isle of Thanet, by the 47 G. 3. sess. 2. c. 7. in the town of Gravesend, &c., by the 47 G. 3. sess. 2. c. 40; in the city of Rochester, &c., by the 48 G. 3. c. 51; in Birmingham, by the 47 G. 3. sess. 1. c. 14; in Manchester, by the 48 G. 3. c. 43; in the manors of Sheffield and Ecclesall, by 48 G. 3. c. 103. (a writ of accedas ad curiam does not lie from this court to the Common Pleas, 10 Moore, 32.): and in the of the court of requests has been extended to the courts of the counties palatine of Chester, sums not exceeding 10l. by the statute 45 G. 3. c. 67; and in the city of Bristol, &c., to sums exceeding two pounds, and not amounting to any sum for which an arrest on mesne process may by law take place, in all actions or causes of debt or contract, whereon money would be recoverable in the courts of common law, under the common counts, in an action of assumpsit, by the 56 G. 3. c. 76. For an alphabetical list of the names of the places having courts of conscience, with the statutes by which they are created, see Man. Ex. Append. 135, &c.

In order to proceed under the Court of Requests' act for Southwark, both plaintiff and defendant must be resident within the jurisdiction of the court. 8 Moore, 429: 1 Bing. 388. S. C. But where the defendant lodged within the jurisdiction of that court, he was holden to be entitled to the benefit of the statutes 22 G. 2. c. 47: 46 G. 3. c. 87: and 4 G. 4. c. 123; although he carried on his business, and the goods were delivered out of the jurisdiction, and the plaintiff had no knowledge of his lodging within it till after the process was sued out; 15 East, 647; but see stat. 4 G. 4. c. 123. § 14. 16. by which the clauses in the Southwark acts respecting costs being repealed, the plaintiff obtaining a verdict for any sum, however trifling, is entitled to costs as in other cases. And no person to whom a debt is owing, not exceeding five pounds, and recoverable by the stats. 25 G. 2. c. 34. and 47 G. 3. sess. 1. c. 14. from any person resident within the jurisdiction of the Birmingham Court of Requests can recover costs, if he sue elsewhere than in that court, wheresoever the plaintiff may reside, or the cause of action accrue. 4 Taunt. 150: 1 Chit. Rep. 636. in notis. So a defendant residing within the jurisdiction of the Court of Requests for the city of Bath is entitled to be sued in that court for a debt under ten pounds, though the cause of action accrued, and the plaintiff resided, out of the jurisdiction; and if such an action be brought elsewhere, the court on motion will deprive the plaintiff of costs. 3 Barn. & Ald. 210: 1 Chit. Rep. 635. S. C.: and see 3 Dowl. & Ryl. 51.

By stat. 19 G. 3. c. 70. so much of all acts for recovery of small debts as authorizes the arrest of a defendant for less than 10l. is repealed, § 3. And by § 4. of the same act it is provided that in all cases when final judgment shall be obtained in any inferior court, and affidavit made thereof in any court of record at Westminster, and of execution being issued against the person or effects of the defendant; and that the same cannot be found within the jurisdiction of the inferior court; the record of such judgment may be removed into the superior court, and writs of execution issued to the sheriff of any county, &c. By 33 G. 3. c. 68. these provisions are extended to judgments in the courts of great Lancaster, and Durham.

By 25 G. 3. c. 45. as to the courts of conscience in London, Middlesex, and Southwark, and by 26 G. 3. c. 38. which extends to all courts of conscience in the kingdom, the time of imprisonment of debtors in execution is regulated, so that it shall not last more than twenty days for debts not exceeding 20s., nor more than forty days for debts not exceeding 40s. Like limitations are made by subsequent local acts for the respective jurisdictions.

Courts Ecclesiastical, Curiæ Ecclesiasticeæ, Spiritual Courts.] Are those courts which are held by the king's authority as supreme governor of the church, for matters which chiefly concern religion. 4 Inst. 321. And the laws and constitutions whereby the church of England is governed, are. 1. Divers immemorial customs. 2. Our own provincial constitutions; and the canons made in convocations, especially those in the year 1603. 3. Statutes or acts of parliament concerning the affairs of religion, or causes of ecclesiastical cognizance: particularly the rubricks in our Common Prayer Book, founded upon the statutes of uniformity. 4. The articles of religion, drawn up in the year 1562, Articuli Cleri, 9 Ed. 2. and established by 33 Eliz. c. 12. and it is said, by the general Canon Law, where all others fail.

As to suits in spiritual or Ecclesiastical Courts, they are for the reformation of manners. or for punishing of heresy, defamation, laying violent hands on a clerk, and the like; and some of their suits are to recover something demanded, as tithes, a legacy, contract of marriage, &c. And in causes of this nature, the courts may give costs, but not damages: things that properly belonging to these jurisdictions are matrimonial and testamentary; and such defamatory words, for which no action lies at law; as for calling one adulterer, fornicator, usurer, or the like. 11 Rep. 54:

Dyer, 240.
The proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts are, according to the civil and canon law, by citation, libel, answer upon oath, proof by witnesses, and presumptions, &c., and after sentence, for contempt, by excommunication: and if the sentence is disliked, by appeal.

The jurisdiction of these courts is volun tary, or contentious; the voluntary is merely concerned in doing what no one opposes as granting dispensations, licenses, faculties.

The punishments inflicted by these courts are censures, punishments pro salute anima, by way of penance, &c. They are not courts of record. See farther tit. Prohibition.

Much oppression having been exercised through the channel of these courts, on persessions, and county courts in Wales, and to sons charged with trifling offences within

By stat. 53 G. 3. c. 127. for the better regulation of Ecclesiastical Courts in England, and the more easy recovery of church rates and tithes (and a similar act, 54 G. 3. c. 68. for Ireland,) it is enacted, that excommunication and all proceedings thereupon, in all cases (except on definitive sentences or decrees pronounced as spiritual censures for offences of ecclesiastical cognizance,) shall be discontinued; and instead thereof a writ de contumace capiendo (in the form required by the act) shall issue to compel the party to obedience, and be executed in like manner as the writ de excom. cap. See 2 Barn. & Adol. 139: see tit. Excommunication, &c. By this act justices of peace are empowered to determine complaints respecting tithes, not exceeding 101.; and in case of Quakers, not exceeding 50l. All suits for tithes must be brought within six years after they are due. Provisions are made for the recovery of church and chapel rates, before justices of the peace; and proctors are prohibited from practising in the several ecclesiastical courts, unless duly admitted and enrolled.

By 2 and 3 W. 4. c. 93. for enforcing process upon contempts in Courts Ecclesiastical of England and Ireland, when any suitors having privilege of peerage or of parliament, or residing out of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, shall have been duly cited to appear in court, or to comply with any order of such court, and shall refuse obedience, or when any such person shall cominit a contempt in face of the court or other contempt, the judge of the court may pronounce such person contumacious and in contempt, and within ten days signify the same to the lord chancellor, in the form mentioned in the 53 G. 3. c. 127. and thereupon in case the party shall not be privileged of peerage or parliament, a writ de contumace capiendo shall be issued from Chancery, directed and returnable as a writ de excommunicato capiendo, and shall have the same force and effeet: and all rules and regulations applicable to the writ de excommunicato capiendo shall be applicable to the writ de contumace capiendo, and the proceedings thereupon; and the officers of Chancery in England and Ireland are directed to issue such writ accordingly, and sheriffs, gaolers, &c. are to execute the same by taking and detaining the body of the party; and upon the due appearance of the party, or his due submission, the judge of the Ecclesiastical Court may pronounce him absolved from the contempt, and order the sheriff, gaoler, &c. to discharge him: and on the party paying his lawful costs, the sheriff shall discharge him.

By § 2. in all cases where persons, whether their spiritual jurisdiction, the stat. 27 G. 3. | privileged or not, domiciled, or residing in England or Ireland, shall have been ordered by order or decree of such court to pay any money, and shall refuse or neglect, or in any way neglect to perform any order or decree of such court, the judge may pronounce him contumacious and in contempt, and within ten days certify the order to the lord chancellor. When such party shall be seized or possessed of any real or personal estate in England, the lord chancellor shall cause a copy of the order to be enrolled in Chancery, and order process of sequestration to issue against the real and personal estate of such party in order to enforce obedience, as if the cause had been instituted in Chancery; and the lord chancellor may make order in respect of the sequestration, and in respect of such real and personal estate as he shall think fit, or for payment of the money levied into the Bank of England to the credit of the party obtaining the order, if the same was for payment of money, or if not, to the credit of the High Court of Chancery.

§ 4. The provisions of the act not to extend to orders or decrees made more than six years before the passing of the act.

§ 5. Actions for any thing done under the act to be brought within three calendar months, and party may plead the general issue, and shall have treble costs on verdict, or if plaintiff non-suited or discontinue, &c.

In briefly recounting the various species of Ecclesiastical Courts, or, as they are often styled, Courts Christian (curia christumitatis,) we may begin with the lowest, and so ascend gradually to the supreme court of appeal.

1. The Archdeacon's Court is the most inferior court in the whole ecclesiastical polity. It is held, in the archdeacon's absence, before a judge appointed by himself, and called his official: and its jurisdiction is sometimes in concurrence with, sometimes in exclusion of, the bishop's court of the diocese. From hence, however, by stat. 24 H. 8. c. 12. an appeal lies to that of the bishop.

2. The Consistory Court of every diocesan bishop is held in their several cathedrals, for the trial of all ecclesiastical causes arising within their respective dioceses. The bishop's chancellor, or his commissary, is the judge; and from his sentence an appeal lies, by virtue of the same statute, to the archbishop of each province respectively.

3. As to The Court of Arches, see tit.

Arches Court.

4. The Court of Peculiars is a branch of, and annexed to, the Court of Arches. It has a jurisdiction over all those parishes dispersed through the province of Canterbury in the midst of other dioceses, which are exempt from the ordinary's jurisdiction, and subject to the metropolitan only. All ecclesiastical causes, arising within these peculiar or ex- cases, to revise the sentence of the Court of empt jurisdictions, are, originally, cogniza-ble by this court; from which an appeal lay formerly to the pope, but now by the stat. 25 H. 8. c. 19. to the king in Chancery.

5. The Prerogative Court is established for the trial of all testamentary causes, where the deceased hath left bona notabilia within two different dioceses. In which case the probate of wills belongs to the archbishop of the province, by way of special prerogative. And all causes relating to the wills, administrations, or legacies, of such persons, are originally cognizable herein, before a judge appointed by the archbishop, called the judge of the Prerogative Court, from whom an appeal lies by stat. 25 H. 8. c. 19. to the king in Chancery, instead of the pope as formerly.

6. The Great Court of Appeal in all ecclesiastical causes was the Court of Delegates, appointed by the king's commission under his Great Seal, and issuing out of Chancery; but the power and franchises of this court are now by 2 and 8 W. 4. c. 92. transferred to the Privy Council (see-infra). This commission was frequently filled with lords, spiritual and temporal, and always with judges of the courts at Westminster, and doctors of the civil law. Appeals to Rome were always looked upon by the English nation, even in time of popery, with an evil eye; as being contrary to the liberty of the subject, the honour of the crown, and the independence of the whole realm; and were first introduced in very turbulent times in the sixteenth year of King Stephen (A. D. 1151); at the same period (Sir Henry Spelman observes) that the civil and canon laws were first imported into England. Cod. Vet. Leg. 315. But in a few years after, to obviate this growing practice, the constitutions made at Clarendon, 11 Hen. II. on account of the disturbances raised by Archbishop Beckett and other zealots of the Holy See, expressly declare (chap. 8.) that appeals in causes ecclesiastical ought to lie, from the archdeacon to the diocesan; from the diocesan to the archbishop of the province; and from the archbishop to the king; and are not to proceed any farther without special licence from the crown. But the unhappy advantage that was given in the reigns of King John and his son Henry III. to the encroaching power of the pope, who was ever vigilant to improve all opportunities of extending his jurisdiction hither, at length riveted the custom of appealing to Rome in causes ecclesiastical so strongly, that it never could be thoroughly broken off till the grand rupture happened in the reign of Henry VIII., when all the jurisdiction usurped by the pope in matters ecclesiastical was restored to the crown, to which it originally belonged; so that the stat. 25 H. 8. was but declaratory of the ancient law of the realm. 4 Inst. 324.

7. A Commission of Review was a commission sometimes granted, in extraordinary Delegates; when it was apprehended they had been led into a material error. But it is now abolished from the 1st Feb. 1833, and the final appeal from the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts is to the king in council. 2 and 3 W. 4. c. 92.

These are now the principal courts of ecclesiastical jurisdiction; none of which are allowed to be courts of record; no more than was another much more formidable jurisdiction, but now deservedly annihilated, viz. the Court of the King's High Commission in causes ecclesiastical. This court was erected and united to the regal power by virtue of the stat. 1 Eliz. c. 1. instead of a larger jurisdiction, which had before been exercised under the pope's authority. It was intended to vindicate the dignity and peace of the church, by reforming, ordering, and correcting the ecclesiastical state and persons, and all manner of errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities; under the shelter of which very general words means were found in that and the two succeeding reigns to vest in the high commissioners extraordinary and almost despotic power of fining and imprisoning; which they exerted much beyond the degree of the offence itself, and frequently over offences by no means of spiritual cognizance. For these reasons, this court was justly abolished by stat. 16 Cur. 1. c. 2. See 3 Comm. 64. & seq.

The wrongs or injuries cognizable by the Ecclesiastical Court not for the reformation of the offender himself, relate chiefly to the non-payment of tithes or other ecclesiastical dues, and fees; for spoliations and dilapidations of church benefices, churches, &c.; matrimonial causes and testamentary causes: as to all these see the proper titles in this

See farther on the general principles as to the jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Courts, this Dict. tits. Canon Law, Civil Law.

In 1830, a commission superseding one appointed the preceding year, issued to inquire into the practice of the ecclesiastical courts in England and Wales. The commissioners in the course of the years 1831 and 1832 made two reports, one special and one general; and a bill, founded in a great measure upon the recommendations of the commissioners, was introduced into the House of Commons by the then Attorney-General, in the beginning of the present session, which was abandoned on the retirement of Sir Robert Peel. Another measure is in contemplation by Lord Melbourne's ministry.

COURT OF HUSTINGS, Curia Hustingi.] The highest court of record, holden at Guildhall. for the City of London, before the Lord mayor and aldermen, the sheriffs and recorder. 4 Inst. 247. This court determines all pleas tenements, and hereditaments, rents, and services, within the City of London and suburbs of the same, are pleadable in two Hustings; one called Hustings of plea of lands, and the other Hustings of common pleas. In this court the burgesses to serve for the city in parliament, must be elected by the livery of the respective companies. In the Hustings of plea of lands are brought writs of right patent, directed to the sheriffs of London, on which writs the tenant shall have three summonses at the three hustings next following, and after the three summonses there shall be three essoins at three other hustings next ensuing, and at the next hustings after the third essoin, if the tenant makes default, process shall be had against him by grand cape, or petit cape, &c. If the tenant appears, the demandant is to declare in the nature of what writ he will; without making protestation to sue in nature of any writ;

then the tenant shall have the view, &c.; and if the parties plead to judgment, the judgment shall be given by the recorder: but no damages, by the custom of the city, are recoverable in any such writ of right patent. In the Hustings of common pleas are pleadable, writs ex gravi querela, writs of gavelet, of dower, waste, &c.; also writs of exigent are taken out in the hustings; and at the fifth hustings the outlawries are awarded, and judgment pronounced by the recorder.

If an erroneous judgment is given in the hustings, the party grieved may sue a commission out of Chancery, directed to certain persons to examine the record, and thereupon do right. 1 Rol. Abr. 745.—See farther the Privilegia Londini; and this Dict. tit. London.

COURT LEET; or LEET. The word Leet is not to be found either in the Saxon law, or in Glanvil, Bracton, Britton, Fleta, or the Mirror, our most ancient law writers: nor in any statute prior to stat. 27 Ed. 3. c. 28. though it is allowed to occur in the Conqueror's charter for the foundation of Battle Abbey, and not unfrequently in Domesday Book. Spelm. in Leta. It seems to be derived from the Saxon, lead, plebs; and to mean the populi curia, or folkmote, as the sheriff's tourn or Leet of the county (at least) appears to have been once actually called (see Spelman in verb. Folkmote), in contradiction, perhaps, to the Halmote, or Court Baron, which consisted of the free tenants only, who being few in number, might conveniently assemble in the lord's hall; whereas the Leet, which required the attendance of all the resiants, within the particular hundred, lordship, or manor, and concerned the administration of public justice, was usually held in the open air. Spelman in verb. Mallobergium. According to times thrice, but most commonly twice in the real, personal, and mixt: and here all lands, Hawkins (Leach's Hawk. P.C. ii. 112. which see) a Court Leet is a court of record, having the same jurisdiction within some particular precinct which the sheriff's tourn hath in the county. See also 4 Comm. 273.

The view of frank-pledge, visus franciplegii, means the examination or survey of the freepledges, of which every man, not particularly privileged, was anciently obliged to have nine, who were bound that he should be always forthcoming to answer any complaint. The better to understand this, we are to be informed, that the kingdom being divided by King Alfred into counties or shires, and each county into hundreds, and each hundred into tithings, each tithing containing ten families or households; the heads of these families were reciprocally bound and responsible for each other; so that, in fact, of every ten householders throughout the kingdom, each man had nine pledges or sureties for his good

Leet is also a word used for a law-day, in several of our ancient statutes. See Dyer,

That the leet is the most ancient court in the land for criminal matters, (the court baron being of no less antiquity in civil), has been pronounced by the highest legal authority, 7 H. 6. 12. b: 1 Roll. Rep. 73. For though we do not meet with the word among the Saxons, there can be no doubt of the existence of the Lord Mansfield states that this court was cocval with the establishment of the Saxons here, and its activity "marked very visibly both amongst the Saxons and the Danes." 3 Burr. 1860. In those times whoever possessed a vill or territory, with the liberties of soc, sac, &c. (a long string of barbarous words) was the lord of a manor, had a court leet, court baron, and, in a word, every privilege which it seems to have been possible for the monarch to bestow, or for the subject to acquire. See Spelman in verb. Manerium.

The leet is a court of record for the cognizance of criminal matters, or pleas of the crown, and necessarily belongs to the king; though a subject, usually the lord of a manor, may be and is entitled to the profits, consisting of the essoign pence, fines, and amercia-

It is held before the steward (or was, in ancient times, before the bailiff) of the lord. Mirror, passim: Finch's Law, 248. See also Kennett's P. A. 319. This officer, who should be a barrister of learning and ability, is a judge of record, may take recognizance of the peace, may fine, imprison, and, in a word, as to things to which his power extends, hath equal power with the justices of the bench. By stat. 1 Jac. 1. c. 5. he is prohibited from taking to the value of 12d. for his own use, by colour of any grant of the profits of this court.

The court is held sometimes once, some-

year: that is, within a month after Easter, | amerciaments thus ascertained are then esand a month after Michaelmas; and cannot, unless by adjournment, be held at any time not warranted by ancient usage. See Mag. Char. c. 35. and Spelman in v. Leta; according to whom this court should be held regularly only once a year, though sometimes, by custom, twice, when it is called residuum letæ. As to the place in which it is held, that, it has been said, may be any where within the precinct. 8 H. 7. 3: Owen, 35. But, more strictly speaking, ought to be certain and accustomed. Rastall's Entries, 151.

All persons above the age of twelve years, and under sixty, except peers, clerks, women, and aliens, resiant within the district, whether masters or servants, owe personal suit and attendance to this court, and ought to be here sworn to their fealty and allegiance. Inst. 120, 121. And here also, by immemorial usage and of common right, that most ancient constitutional officer, the constable (4 Inst. 265,), and sometimes by prescription the mayor of a borough (see stat. 2 G. 1. c. 4.), are elected and sworn. A custom for a steward of a court leet to nominate certain persons to the bailiff to be summoned on the jury, is good. 2 Barn. & Cres. 54.

The general jurisdiction of the court extends to all crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, at the common law, as well as to several others which have been subjected to it by act of parliament. These are inquired after by a body of the suitors, elected, sworn, and charged, for that purpose, who must not be less than twelve, nor more than twenty-three; and who, in some manors, continue in office for a whole year, while in others they are sworn and discharged in the course of a day. Whatever they find they present to the steward, who, if the offence be treason or felony, must return the presentment (in these cases called an indictment) to the king's justices of over and terminer, and gaol delivery. See stats. W. 2. c. 13: 1 Ed. 3. st. 2. c. 17. In all other cases he has power, upon the complaint of any party grieved, or upon suspicion of the concealment of any offence, to cause an immediate inquiry into the truth of the matter, by another jury. See stats. 33 H. S. c. 6. and 1 Eliz. c. 17. § 10. But the presentment, being received, and the day passed, shall be held true, and unless it concern the party's freehold, shall not be shaken or questioned by any tribunal whatever. Hale, P. C. 153. 5: Leach's Hawk. P. C. ii. 111, 112: and 11 Co. 44. Upon every presentment of the jury retained by the court, an amerciament follows of course, which is afterwards assessed in open court agreeable to Magna Charta, c. 14. by the pares curiæ, that is, the peers or equals of the delinquent; and affeered or reduced to a precise sum, by two or more suitors, sworn to be impartial. 8 Rep. 39. See also stat. W. 1. c. 6. And that these statutes were in this particular but in affirmation of the common law, see 8 Rep. 33. b.: 2 Inst. 27. The treated (or extracted) from the roll or book in which the proceedings are recorded, and levied by the bailiff, by distress and sale of the party's goods (8 Rep. 41.), by virtue of a warrant from the steward to that effect, or may be recovered by other means, as by a process of levari facias (Hardr. 471.), or action of debt. Bull. N. P. 167. No crime in those remote ages appears to have been punished by death, unless it were open theft, where the offender is taken with the mainour, that is, with the thing stolen upon him; and of this crime, and this only, the cognizance did not belong to the lect. All other offences, of what nature or degree soever, subjected the party to mulet or pecuniary fine, which was in many cases determined and fixed. This pecuniary composition, with respect to certain capital offences, was abrogated, and the punishment of death substituted in its place, by King Henry I. Spelman in v. Felo: Wilkins, LL. Sax. 304.

It is not improbable that the distinction of indictments for felonies, and presentments of inferior offences, owes its origin to the above

It has been said, that by the clause nullus vicecomies, &c. in the Great Charter, c. 17. the jurisdiction of the leet was abridged, and its power to hear and determine taken away; but this has been said and repeated without due attention either to the nature and constitution of the court, or to the law of the time. No offence, it is well known, is at this day, or, for aught that appears, ever was, heard and determined in the leet (nor, before the period referred to, by any other criminal court in the kingdom), otherwise than upon the presentment of twelve men, or what we now call in most courts the grand jury. This presentment, as has been already observed, found and established the fact; and judgment, whether of misericordia, mutilation, or death, followed as an incident or matter of course, precisely, indeed, as the punishment does at this day on the verdict for the king of the petty jury. In fact, therefore, the jurisdiction of the leet was not in the least abridged or affected by that charter; nor is it at all probable that the barons would either seek or suffer the diminution of their own privileges. of which, on the contrary, there is an express

That this court has no power to inquire of the death of a man, or of a rape, is a more ancient, but not less erroneous opinion. The contrary is most directly and expressly held in the Stattutum Wallie, in Britton, Fleta, the Mirror, and the stat. of 18 Ed. 2. (which statute, though it enumerates certain particulars of the jurisdiction of the leet, does not confine it to them only); all much older and better authorities than the Book of Assizes. 41 Ed. 3. p. 40. in which that opinion first

The steward of a leet may award to prison persons either indicted or accused of felony before him, or guilty of any contempt in the face of the court. Stat. Westm. 2. c. 13. which, however, seems to apply only to the sheriff's tourn. See Crom. J. P. 92. b.: Ow. 113. A steward of a court leet having told W. H. that he was a resiant, who replied he lied, thereupon the steward fined him 20l., and adjudged good, without a prescription so to do; and debt lies for the fine. 3 Salk. 33. In a presentment in a court leet, it is not necessary to show how or by what right the court is held. 1 Salk. 200.

By 1 (vulgo 2) Jac. 1. c. 5. stewards of courts leet and courts baron guilty of extortion shall forfeit 40l., and be incapacitated. See farther, for the whole of this subject,

Com. Dig. tit. Leet.

The court leet has now been for a long time in a declining way; its business, as well as that of the tourn, having for the most part gradually devolved on the quarter sessions.

See 4 Comm. 274: 3 Burr. 1864.

This last circumstance is very pathetically lamented by the ingenious author from whom the above account of the court leet is principally drawn, and to whom the editor of the present work is indebted for much of the information under tit. Constable. How far the restoration of the power of the court leet in the present extensive deluge of crimes is advisable or not, is a question not to be determined in the compass here allotted to the subject. Every one desirous of being accurately informed of the foundations of the English law will wish that the learned author, from whom the above extracts have been made, would spend his time rather in examining the ancient than condemning the present state of our jurisprudence. For the former task he is eminently qualified; the latter is only worthy of inferior talents.

COURT OF MARSHALSEA, Curia Palatii.] A court of record to hear and determine causes between the servants of the king's household and others within the verge; and hath jurisdiction of all matters within the verge of the court, and of pleas of trespass, where either party is of the king's family, and of all other actions personal, wherein both parties are the king's servants; and this is the original jurisdiction of the Court of Marshalsea. 1 Bulst. 211. But the Curia Palatii, erected by King Charles I., by letters-patent, in the 6th year of his reign, and made a court of record, hath power to try all personal actions, as debt, trespass, slander, trover, actions on the case, &c., between party and party, the liberty whereof extends twelve miles about Whitehall. Stat. 13 R. 2. st. 1. c. 3. Which jurisdiction was confirmed by King Charles II.

The judges of this court are the steward of the king's household, and knight marshal for the time being, and the steward of the court, or his deputy, being always a lawyer. Crompt. Jurisd. 102; Kitch. 199, &c.: 2 Inst.

This court is kept once a-week in Southwark; and the proceedings here are either by capias or attachment, which is to be served on the defendant by one of the knight-marshal's men, who takes bond with sureties for his appearance at the next court; upon which appearance he must give bail to answer the determination of the court; and the next court after the bail is taken the plaintiff is to declare and set forth the cause of his action. and afterwards proceed to issue and trial by a jury, according to the custom of the common law courts. If a cause is of importance, it is usually removed into B. R. or C. B. by an habeas corpus cum causa; otherwise, causes are here brought to trial in four or five court-days. The inferior business of this court hath of late years been much reduced by the new courts of conscience in and near London, for which the four counsel belonging to the court were indemnified by salaries during their lives, by stat. 23 G. 2. c. 27.

By stat. 28 Ed. 1. c. 3. the steward and marshal of the king's house are not to hold plea of freehold, &c. Error in the Marshalsea Court may be removed into the King's Bench. Stat. 5 Ed. 3. st. 2. c. 3. And the fees of the Marshalsea are limited by the stat. 2 H. 4. c. 23. This Marshalsea is that of the household; not the King's Marshalsea, which belongs to the King's Bench. See Court of the Lord Steward, &c.

COURT MARTIAL. Curia Martialis.] A court for trying and punishing the military offences of officers and soldiers.

I. Of the Origin II. Of the Jurisdiction of Courts Martial.

I. Of the Origin of Courts Martial .-Though the authority of the Court of Chivalry, with regard to matters of war, &c., both within and without the realm, not determinable by the general municipal law, was first established by the common law, and afterwards confirmed by several statutes; and was never objected to, even in criminal cases, till the post of high constable was laid aside (see tits. Constable, Court of Chivalry); yet we find its jurisdiction encroached upon much earlier; for by the stat. 18 H. 6. c. 19. desertion from the king's army was made felony, and by stats. 7 H. 7. c. 1: 3 H. 8. c. 5. benefit of clergy is taken away, and authority given to justices of peace to inquire thereof, and hear and determine the same. And Rapin quotes an instance of Hen. VII. having ordered those accused of holding intelligence with the enemy after the battle of Stoke, 1487, to be tried by commissioners of his own appointing, or by courts martial, according to the martial law; instead of the usual court of justice, which was not so favourable to his design of punishing them only by fines. This, however, seems to have been an avaricious, arbitrary, and illegal exertion of power, not authorised by any law of the land.

From the time that the Court of Chivalry was abridged of its criminal jurisdiction by the suppression of the post of high constable until the Revolution, there appears to have been no regular established court for the administration of martial law. For although the Court of Chivalry still continued to be held from time to time by the earl marshal, its authority extended only to civil matters; and notwithstanding desertion was by stat. 2 and 3 Ed. 6. c. 2. made felony without benefit of clergy, and other military crimes were made punishable by fines, imprisonment, &c., and by stat. 39 Eliz. c. 17. idle and wandering soldiers and mariners were to be reputed as felons, and to suffer, as in cases of felony, without benefit of clergy (with some excep-tions); and the justices of assize and gaol-delivery were to hear and determine these offences; yet there are instances during this period of other courts being erected for the administration of martial law, and not only military persons made subject to it, but many others punished thereby; some entirely at the discretion of the crown, and others by appointment of the parliament only; and it was a circumstance of nearly a similar nature that occasioned the enacting the Petition of Right, 3 C. 1. c. 1. one clause of which was, that the commissions for proceeding by martial law should be dissolved and annulled, and no such commission be issued for the future.

Though undoubtedly these commissions were illegal, yet the necessity of subordination in the army, and the impossibility of establishing that subordination without martial law, soon became apparent, and the two houses of parliament, in the beginning of their rebellion against Charles I. passed an ordinance, appointing commissioners to execute martial law; which was certainly at least as unconstitutional an act without the assent of the king as any proceedings of his had been without consent of parliament. true is it that necessity has no law, and that usurped power is always obliged to have recourse to means to support itself at least as severe as, and generally more violent than, those which it previously condemns in a lawful government, which it may for a while succeed in overturning, on false and specious pretexts of undefined liberty.

This ordinance was passed in 1644, and afterwards renewed by the parliament; and in process of time adopted as a model for the Mutiny Act passed after the Revolution: as many other regulations made during the powerful, but tyrannical, usurpation of sovereign authority, were afterwards modified to the true genius of the British constitution.

At the restoration, one of the first steps taken by the parliament was to disband the army, and to regulate the militia, among whom a military subordination was established whenever they were drawn out, and fines and imprisonments imposed on them for particular delinquencies. See tit. Militia.

Charles II., however, kept up 5,000 regular troops, for guards and garrisons, by his own authority; which his successor, James II., by degrees increased to 30,000, and more numerous armies were occasionally raised by authority of parliament; yet we find no statute for the government of these troops, nor was it till after the Revolution that a regular act of the whole legislature passed for punishing mutiny and desertion, &c., by courts martial.

This act was first occasioned by a mutiny, in a body of English and Scotch troops, upon their being ordered to Holland, to replace some of the Dutch troops which Will. III. had brought over with him, and intended to keep in England. The king immediately communicated this event to the parliament, who readily agreed to give their sanction to punish the offenders; and on the 3d April, 1689 (1 W. & M.), passed an act for punishing mutiny and desertion, &c., which was to continue in force only until November following. It was, however, renewed again in January, and has, with the interruption of about three years only, from April, 1698, to February, 1701, been annually renewed ever since, with some occasional alterations and amendments, as well in times of peace as war.

II. Of the Jurisdiction of Courts Martial.— Martial law, as formerly exercised at the discretion of the crown, and too often made subservient to bad purposes, justly became obnoxious to the people; and not only the propriety, but the legality, of its being executed in times of peace, has been absolutely denied. It is laid down (3 Inst. 52.) that if a lieutenant or other, that hath commission of martial law, doth in time of peace hang or otherwise execute any man by colour of martial law, this is murder, for it is against Magna Charta. And Hale (Hist. C. L. c. 2.) declares martial law to be, in reality, no law, but something indulged rather than allowed as law; that the necessity of order and discipline is the only thing which can give it countenance, and therefore it ought not to be permitted in time of peace, when the king's courts are open for all persons to receive justice according to the laws of the land; and if a court martial put a man to death in time of peace, the officers are guilty of murder. See H. P. C. 46.

As future exigencies, however, have arisen in the state, it has become necessary to alter and amend the old laws, and enact new ones; and, since the custom of keeping up standing armics in time of peace as well as war has become prevalent and general throughout Europe (a custom, as it seems, originally introduced by Charles VII. of France about 1445), the legislature of Great Britain has also judged it necessary, for the safety of the kingdom, the defence of its possessions, and the balance of power in Europe (as the preamble to the Mutiny Act expresses it), to maintain, even in times of peace, a standing body of troops; and to authorise the exercise of martial law among them, between martial law, as formerly executed, entirely at the discretion of the crown, and unbounded in its authority, either as to persons or crimes, and that at present established, which is limited with regard to both. Courts martial are at present held by the same authority as the other courts of judicature of this kingdom; and the king (or his generals, when empowered to appoint them) has the same prerogative of moderating the rigour of the law, and pardoning and remitting punishments, as in other cases; but he can no more add to, nor alter the sentence of a court martial, than he can a judgment given in the courts of law. Martial law is now exercised within its proper limits, by the advice and concurrence of parliament, and the condemnation of criminals by courts martial acting under such authority, cannot be regarded as illegal, or contrary to Magna Charta; since, during the existence of the statute by which these courts are held, martial law, so modified and restrained, is as much part of the law of the land as Magna Charta itself.

Courts martial being established in this country by positive law, their proceedings, and the relation in which they stand to the courts of Westminster-hall, must depend upon the same rules with all other courts which are instituted, and have particular powers given them, and whose acts, therefore, may become the subject of application to the courts of Westminster for a prohibition. 2 H. Blackst.

Courts martial are bound by the same rules and principles of evidence as the courts of law, and their proceedings, when not otherwise regulated by statute, must be in accordance therewith. 1 East, 313.

It is not incidental to the duty of the office of a commander-in-chief of a squadron to hold a court martial on an inferior officer. 1 T. R. 493. affirmed in Dom. Proc. 1 T. R. 784.

If a superior officer imprisons his inferior officer for disobedience of an order not within the scope of military authority, he is liable in trespass, although there has been a trial by court martial for the offence. 4 Taunt. 67.

Courts martial cannot sit before eight in the morning, or after three in the afternoon, except in cases which require an immediate example; the attendance, therefore, of the members does not exceed seven hours at a time, and they are at liberty to adjourn from day to day till they have fully considered the matter before them; and when they come to give their opinions, they are not under the necessity of being unanimous, but the prisoner is condemned or acquitted by a majority of voices; except in cases of death, where nine out of thirteen, or two-thirds, if there be more than thirteen present, must concur in opinion. Articles of War, § 15. a. 8, 9.

As to general courts martial, the Mutiny Act and Articles of War are very explicit, both as to the number they shall consist of, Gould, 2 H. Black, Rep. 69.

A proper distinction then should be made | and the rank of the officers who are to compose them.

The crimes that are congnisable by a couft martial, as repugnant to military discipline, are pointed out by the Mutiny Act and Articles of War, which every military man is, or ought to be, fully acquainted with, and therefore not necessary to be recited here; and as to other crimes, which officers and soldiers being guilty of are to be tried for in the ordinary course of law, it is needless to enter into a detail of them.

By the last article in the code of military laws, courts martial are authorised to take cognizance of all crimes not capital, and all disorders and neglects which officers and soldiers may be guilty of, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, which are not enumerated in the preceding articles, and punish them at their discretion. Art. of War, § 20. a. 3. Upon the authority of this article it has been too much the custom in the army to try soldiers by courts martial for thefts, and other crimes cognizable before the courts of But it seems questionable whether an exception might not, in many such cases, be made to their jurisdiction; for the Mutiny Acts and Articles of War, § 11. a. 1. expressly direct, that any officer, non-commissioned officer, or soldier, who shall be accused of any capital crime, violence, or offence, against the person, estate, or property of any of his majesty's subjects, punishable by the laws of the land, shall be delivered over to the civil magistrate by the commanding officer, under penalty of his being cashiered in case of refusal. There was formerly an article, of late omitted, particularly authorizing courts martial to take cognizance of all soldiers accused of stealing from their comrades.

The persons liable to martial law are likewise enumerated in the act and the articles. The latter mention only officers, soldiers, and persons serving with the armies in the field; but Hale and others are of opinion that aliens, who in a hostile manner invade the kingdom, whether their king were at war or peace with ours, and whether they come by themselves or in company with English traitors, cannot be punished as traitors, but must be dealt with by martial law. H. P. C. cc. 10. 15: 3 Inst. This, however, means martial law in the strict sense of the word, in which it cannot be applied to proceedings under the Mutiny Act, and which kind of martial law is unknown in this kingdom. The receiving pay as a soldier subjects the receiver to military jurisdiction. The Court of C. P. therefore refused to grant a prohibition to prevent the execution of the sentence of a court martial, passed against one who received pay as a soldier, but who assumed the military character merely for the purpose of recruiting, in the usual course of that service; and this though the proceedings of the court martial appeared, in some instances, to be erroneous. Grant v. Sir Charles Officers on half-pay are not liable to trial, ceeding; for the Court of King's Bench, beby court martial. See opinions of the judges: MArthur on Courts Martial, v. 1. 196: Barne's Notes, 432. But it is otherwise as to officers holding brevet commissions. MArthur, v. 1. 201.

The Articles of War in a few cases point out the express sentence to be passed on criminals, without any alternative; in some an optional power is given of punishing with death, or otherwise, and in others offenders are punished at the discretion of the court, omitting the word death; evidently meaning thereby to exclude the power of punishing capitally in such cases.

In cases where an optional power is vested in the court to punish with death or otherwise, the question to follow that of guilty or not guilty (upon the court, or the majority of it, declaring for the former), is whether or not the prisoner shall suffer death? If twothirds of the court do not concur in the affirmative, the votes of the affirmants are considered as void. A lesser number than twothirds being, as was before said, incompetent to give judgment of death, another question becomes necessary to be proposed to every member, what punishment other than death shall the prisoner undergo? And each member gives his voice, de novo, on this question, wherein a majority is competent to determine.

The crimes cognizable by a court martial may be divided into felonies and misdemeanors; or, more properly, into capital offences, and offences only criminal, and not capital; and if, on the evidence, a prisoner does not appear guilty of a crime of so capital a nature as is set forth in the charge, the court may find him guilty in a less degree; but they cannot declare him guilty of a mutiny, or any other distinct crime or offence, unless it be likewise in the charge given against him, before the trial commences.

By stat. 37 G. 3. c. 140. his majesty is enabled more easily and effectually to grant conditional pardons to persons under sentence by naval courts martial, and to regulate imprisonment under such sentences, viz.

By § 1. if his majesty shall extend his mercy to persons liable to death by the sentence of a naval court martial, a justice of the King's Bench, &c. may, on notification from the secretary of state, allow the benefit of such conditional pardon as if it had passed under the Great seal, and shall make orders accordingly.

The justice or baron allowing the pardon shall direct the notification, and order it to be filed with the clerk of the crown of the Court of King's Bench. § 2. Like provisions are made with respect to the army by the annual Mutiny Acts.

The judgments of courts martial, besides being open to the disapprobation of the king, or his commanders in chief, are liable, like those of other courts, to be taken cognizance of, and the members punished, for illegal pro- orders committed in them; so called because ing the supreme court of common law, hath not only power to reverse erroneous judgments given by inferior courts, but also to punish all inferior magistrates, and all officers of justice, for all wilful and corrupt abuses of authority against the known, obvious, and common principles of justice. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 3. § 10; c. 27. § 22. The Mutiny Act directs that every action against any member or minister of a court martial, in respect to any sentence, shall be brought in some of the courts of record at Westminster, &c. § 63. And there have been many instances of actions of this nature in Westminster-hall. See NAVY, III. ad finem. An officer on a court martial, however, is not liable to be punished for mere mistakes which an honest well-meaning man may innocently fall into; and if the plaintiff or prosecutor becomes non-suited, or the defendant has a verdict, he shall recover treble costs. Mutiny Act, § 62. There is also another tribunal before which the proceedings of courts martial are liable to censure at least, namely, the House of Commons.

It is enacted by the Mutiny Acts that no officer or soldier, being acquitted or convicted of any offence, shall be liable to be tried a second time by the same or any other court martial for the same offence, unless in the case of an appeal from a regimental to a general court martial; and by the Articles of War, "If upon a second hearing the appeal shall appear to be vexatious and groundless, the person so appealing shall be punished at the discretion of the general court martial." No sentence given by any court martial, and signed by the president, is liable to be revised more than once; and this may be rather deemed an appeal to the same court than a new trial, since in this case the same persons only are to re-consider what they have already done, without any new judges being added to them, or any new witnesses produced.

A distinction is made in the oath taken by the president and members of a court martial. and that of the judge advocate. The former are sworn not only to conceal the vote or opinion of each particular member, but also the sentence of the court, until it shall be approved by his majesty, or by some person duly authorised by him; the latter is only sworn not to divulge the opinion of any par-ticular member of the court martial. Witnesses summoned to court martial are liable to attachment for non-attendance. See Mutiny Act, 7 and 8 G. 4. c. 4. § 28.

For farther particulars, see Adye's Treatise on Courts Martial, from whence most of the above is abridged. See also this Dict. tit. Soldiers. And, as to naval courts martial, tit. Navy. See also M'Arthur on Courts Martial, they are most usual in summer, when the suitors to the court have dusty feet; and from the expedition in hearing causes proper thereunto, before the dust goes off the feet of the plaintiffs and defendants. 4 Inst. 272. Or from pied pouldreaux, a pedlar. Barrington Anc. stats. 337. It is a court of record incident to every fair, and to be held only during the time that the fair is kept. Doct. & Stud. c. 5. As to the jurisdiction, the cause of action for contract, slander, &c. must arise in the fair or market, and not before at any former fair, nor after the fair; it is to be for some matter concerning the same fair or market, and must be done, complained of, heard and determined the same day. Also the plaintiff must make oath that the contract, &c. was within the jurisdiction and time of the fair. See stats. 17 Ed. 4. c. 2:1 Rich. 3. c. 6.

Court of Piepowder, Curia pedis pulverisati.] Is a court held in fairs, to do justice to buyers and sellers, and for redress of dis-

The Court of Piepowder may hold a plea of a sum above 40s., and it is said, judgment may be given at another fair, at a court held there, and a writ of error lies upon a judgment given. Dyer, 133: F. N. B. 18. This court may not meddle with any thing done in a market without a special custom for it, but for what is done in a fair only: and not there for slanderous words, unless they concern matters of contract in the fair; as where it is for slandering the wares of another, and not of his person in the same fair. Moor. Ca. 854. The steward before whom the court is held is the judge, and the trial is by merchants and traders in the fair; and the judgment against the defendant shall be quod amercietur. If the steward proceeds contrary to the stat. 17 Ed. 4. c. 2. he shall forfeit 5l.

From this court a writ of error lies, in the nature of an appeal to the courts at Westminster. Cro. Eliz. 773. And those courts are now bound by the stat. 19 G. 3. c. 70. to issue writs of execution in aid of its process, after judgment, where the person or effects of the defendant are not within the limits of this inferior jurisdiction. See Piepowder.

COURT OF REQUESTS, Curia Requisitionum.] Was a court of equity of the same nature with the Court of Chancery, but inferior to it, principally instituted for the relief of such petitioners as in conscionable cases addressed themselves by supplication to his majesty. Of this court the lord privy seal was chief judge, assisted by the master of requests; and it had beginning about the 9 H. 7. according to Sir Julius Casar's Tractate on this subject; though Mr. Gwyn, in his Preface to his Readings, saith it began from a commission first granted by King Hen. VIII.

This court having assumed great power to itself, so that it became burdensome, Mich. anno 40 and 41 Eliz., in the Court of Common Pleas it was adjudged, upon solemn argument, that the Court of Requests was no court of judicature, &c. And by the stat. 16 and 17 Car. 1. c. 10. it was taken away. 4 Inst. 97. See tit. Courts of Conscience.

COURT OF SESSION in Scotland. See the acts 48 G. 3. c. 151. 59 G. 3. c. 45. 6 G. 4. c. 120. for the better regulation of this court.

COURT OF THE LORD STEWARD OF THE KING'S HOUSE. The lord steward, or, in his absence, the treasurer and controller of the king's house, and steward of the Marshalsea, may inquire of, hear, and determine in this court all treasons, murders, manslaughter, bloodsheds, and other malicious strikings, whereby blood shall be shed, in any of the palaces and houses of the king [or within the limits, i.e. 200 feet from the gate, 4 Comm. 276.] or in any other house where his royal person shall abide. And this jurisdiction was given by the stat. 33 H. 8. c. 12. 3 Inst. 140. But this court was at first intended only to inquire of and punish felonies, &c. by the king's servants, against any lord or other person of the king's council. 3 H. 7 c. 14. See 4 Comm. 276.

COURT OF STAR-CHAMBER, Curia Cameræ Stellatæ. A court of very ancient original, but new-modelled by stats. 3 H. 7. c. 1: 21 H. 8. c. 20. which ordained, That the lord chancellor, treasurer, and lord privy seal, calling a bishop, and lord of the king's council, and the two chief justices, to their assistance, on bill or information might make process against maintainors, rioters, persons unlawfully assembling, and for other misdemeanors, which, through the power and countenance of such as did commit them, lifted up their heads above their faults, and punish them as if the offenders had been convicted at law by a jury, &c. But this act was repealed, and the court, dissolved, by stat. 16 and 17 Car. 1. c. 10. having been used to oppress the subject, particularly in matters of state.

Courts of Universities. These are the chancellor's courts in the two universities of England, Oxford and Cambridge; which two learned bodies enjoy the sole jurisdiction, in exclusion of the king's courts, over all civil actions and suits whatsoever, when a scholar or privileged person is one of the parties; excepting in such cases where the right of freehold is concerned; and these, by the University Charter, they are at liberty to try and determine, either according to the common law of the land, or according to their own local customs, at their discretion; which has generally led them to carry on their process in a course much conformed to the civil law.

These privileges were granted that the students might not be distracted from their studies by legal process from distant courts, and other forensic avocations. The oldest charter, it appears, containing this grant to the University of Oxford, was 28 H. 3. A. D. 1244. And the same privileges were confirmed and enlarged by almost every succeeding prince, down to King Hen. VIII., in the 14th year of whose reign the largest and most extensive charter of all was granted. One similar to which was afterwards granted to Cambridge in the 3d year of Queen Elizabeth. But yet, notwithstanding these charters, the privileges granted therein, of proceeding in a course different from the law of the land, were of so high a nature, that they were held to be invalid; for though the king might erect new courts, yet he could not alter the course of law by his letters patent. Therefore, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth a statute was passed (13 Eliz. c. 29.,) confirming all the charters, of the two universities, and those of 14 II. 8. and 3 Eliz. by name; which statute established this high privilege without any doubt or opposition. Jenk. Cent. 2. pl. 88.; Cent. 3. pl. 33: Hard. 504: Godb. 201: Hist. C. L. 33.

This privilege, so far as it relates to civil causes, is exercised at Oxford in the chancellor's court; the judge of which is the vice-chancellor, his deputy, or assessor. From his sentence an appeal lies to delegates appointed by the congregation; from thence to other delegates of the house of convocation; and if they all three concur in the same sentence, it is final, at least by the statutes of the university (Tit. 21. § 18.), according to the rule of the civil law. (Cod. 7. 70, 1.) But if there be any discordance or variation in any of the three sentences, an appeal lies, in the last resort, to judges' delegates, appointed by the crown under the great seal in Chancery. 3 Comm. 83—5. See 2 Ld. Raym. 1346. that it is the same at Cambridge. See farther tit. University.

Courts of Wales, Curiæ Principalitatis Walliæ.] The courts of the principality of Wales. These courts are now abolished, by I W. 4. c. 70. and the courts at Westminster have now jurisdiction in Wales. The principality is divided into two circuits: one judge goes through the six counties of South Wales, and another judge through the six counties of North Wales; and they meet at Chester, and together hold the assizes for that county, the palatine jurisdiction of which is abolished by the same statute.

CRIMES. As the guilt of offending against the law arises from the disobedience being wilful, it follows that those who are incapable of understanding it, or conforming themselves to it, cannot with propriety be said to transgress or incur the penalty instituted for the punishment of crime; persons, therefore, under a natural disability of distinguishing between good and evil, as infants under the age of discretion, idiots, and lunatics, are not punishable by any criminal prosecution. See 1 Hawk. P. C. 1: 1 Hale Hist. 14: 4 Black. Com. 20. As to the trial and ultimate safe custody of persons charged with felony, and acquitted thereof by the jury on the ground of insanity, see 39 and 40 G. 3. c. 94.

Persons sending or delivering any letter containing menacing demands of money, &c., or threatening to accuse of any crime punishable with death, or any infamous crime, guilty of felony by 7 and 8 G. 4. c. 29. § 8; § 9. declares what shall be deemed an infamous crime. If an infant be infra seven years old, he cannot be guilty of felony, whatever circumstances proving discretion may appear; for, ex presumptive juris, he cannot have discretion, and no averment shall be received against that presumption. 1 H. H. 28: Plowden, 19. a.: Fost. 349.

As to misdemeanors, and offences not capital, in some cases an infant is privileged by his non-age; and herein the privilege is all one, whether he be above or under the age of fourteen, if he is under twenty-one. However, there is this distinction: if an infant under twenty-one is indicted for a misdemeanor, as riots or battery he shall not be privileged barely by reason that he is under twenty-one; but if the offence charged be a mere non-feasance (unless it be of a thing he is bound to do by tenure, as repairing a bridge, &c.), then in some cases he shall be CROCIA. The crosier or pastoral staff, so called a similitudine crucis, which bishops, &c. had the privilege to carry as the common ensign of their religious office, being invested in their prelacies by the delivery of such a crosier; hence the word crocia did sometimes denote the collation to, or disposal of, bishoprics and abbeys, by the donation of such pastoral staff: so as when the king granted large jurisdictions, exceptis crociis, it is meant, except the collation or investiture of episcopal fees, &c. Addit. to Cowel. See tit. Bishops.

CROCIARIUS. 'The crociary or crossbearer, who, like our verger, went before the prelate, and bore his cross. Liber de Miraculis Tho. Episc. Heref. M. S. anno 1290.

CROFT, Sax. croftum and crofta.] A little close adjoining to a dwelling-house, and enclosed for pasture or arable, or any particular use. In some old deeds crufta occurs as the Latin word for a croft; but cum toflis et croftis is most frequent. Ingulph. It seems to be derived from the old English word creaft, signifying handy-craft; because such grounds are usually manured and extraordinarily drest by the hand and skill of the owner. See CROISES, and croisado. See Croyses.

CROK, crocus.] Turning up the hair into curls or crocks; whence comes crook, crooked, &c. Pat. 21 H. 3.

CROP, croppa.] The seeds or products of the harvest in corn, &c. Fleta, lib. 2. c. 82.

CROSS-BOWS. None shall shoot in, or keep any cross-bow, hand-gun, hagbut, &c., but those who have lands of the value of 100l. per annum; and no person shall travel with a cross-bow bent, or gun charged, except in time of war; or shoot within a quarter of a mile of any city, or market-town, unless for defence of himself or his house, or at a dead mark, under the penalty of 10l. Stat. 33 H. 8. c. 6. See tits. Arms, Game.

CROSSES. By stat. 13 Eliz. c. 2. (repealed by 3 G. 4. c. 41. § 2.) crosses, beads, &c. used by the Roman Catholics, were prohibited to be brought into this kingdom, on pain of a præmunire, &cc. In ancient times, it was usual for men to creet crosses on their houses, by which they would claim the privileges of the templars to defend themselves against their rightful lords; but this was condemned by the stat. Westm. 2. c. 37. It was likewise customary in those days to set up the nobility rested, as it was carried to be buried, that à transeuntibus pro ejus anima deprecetur. Walsing. anno 1201. were several of these crosses erected over England, especially in honour of the resting places of our kings, on their bodies being transmitted to any distant place for burial; but these superstitions sunk in this kingdom with the Romish religion.

CROYSES, cruce signati.] Is used by Britton for pilgrims, because they wear the sign of the cross upon their garments. Of these and their privileges, Bracton hath treated, lib. 5. part 2. cap. 2. part 5. cap. 9. Under this word are also signified the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, created for the defence of pilgrims; and likewise all those persons who in the reigns of King Henry II., Richard I., Henry III., and Edward I. cruce signati, took upon them the croisado, dedicating and listing themselves to the wars, for the recovery of Jerusalem and the Holy Land. CROWN. See tit. King.

CROWN OFFICE. An office belonging to the Court of King's Bench, of which the king's coroner or attorney there is commonly master, who holds his place for life by letters patent under the great seal. The attorneygeneral, and clerk of the crown exhibit informations in this office, for crimes and misdemeanors; the one ex officio, and the other usually by order of court; and here informations may be laid for offences and misdemeanors at common law, as for butteries, conspiracies, libelling, nuisances, contempt, seditious words, &c. wherein the offender is liable to pay a fine to the king. Finch. 340: Show.

By stat. 4 and 5 W. & M. c. 18. the clerk of the crown, in B. R. is not to receive or file any information for trespuss, battery, &c .. without express order of court: nor to issue any process, without taking a recognizance in 201. penalty to prosecute with effect; and if the party appear, and the plaintiff do not pro-cure a trial in a year, or if verdict pass for the defendant, &c., the court shall award the defendent costs; but this act doth not extend to informations in the name of the king's coroner, or attorney, &c. See farther, 1 Chitty, cap. 156. and the authorities there cited.

When a battery is committed privately, so that the person injured can make no proof thereof by witnesses at law; it is usual to bring an information in this oflice, or to prefer an indictment, the most legal method, where the party may be a witness for the king, it being his suit. CUI IN VITA. A writ of entry, for a widow against him to whom her husband aliened her lands or tenements in his life

Where the husband and wife exchange the lands of the wife for other lands, if the wife agree unto the exchange after the husband's death, she shall not have a cui in vita. Also if the wife do accept of parcel of the land in dower, of which she hath a cui in vita, by that acceptance she shall be barred of the residue. New. Nat. Br. 430. If the husband and wife lose by default the wife's lands, after the death of her husband, she shall have a cui in vita to recover those lands so lost by default. F. N. B. 187. By stat. 13 Ed. 1. c. 3. cui in vita is given to the wife where the deceased husband lost her lands by default in fend her right during his life, if she come in in case of pluralities of livings, or where a before judgment. Likewise if tenant in dower, by the curtesy, or for life, do make default, &c., the heirs and they to whom the reversion belongeth shall be admitted to their answer, if they come before judgment; and if on default judgment happen to be given, such heirs, &c. shall have a writ of entry for recovery of the same after the death of such tenants. See Booth on Real Actions, and F. N. B.—Now abolished.

CULAGIUM." The laying up of a ship in the dock to be repaired. MS. Arth. Trevor. Arm. de Plac. Edw. 3.

CULM. See Coal.

CULPRIT. A prisoner accused for trial. The word arose originally from the reply of the proper officer in behalf of the king, affirming a criminal to be guilty, after he hath pleaded Not Guilty, without which the issue to be tried is not joined: it is compounded of two words, viz. cul. and prit; the one an abbreviation of culpabilis, and the other derived from the French word prest, i. e. ready; and it is as much as to say that he is ready to prove the offender guilty. See 4 Comm. 339.

CULREACH. A caution given by a lord of regality, to punish a malefactor, whom he replevied from the sheriff .- Scotch Dict.

Blount.

CULVERTAGE. culvertagium.] Is said by some persons to be derived from culum and vertere, to turn tail: and in this sense, sub nomine culvertagii, was taken to be on pain of cowardice, or being accounted cowards. And in this sense Spelman in voc. Niderling derives it from culver, a dove. But in the opinion of others, it rather signifies some base slavery, or the confiscation of an estate; being a feudal term for the lands of the vassal forfeited and escheating to the lord: and sub nomine culvertagii in this signification, was under pain of confiscation. Mat. Paris, anno 1212.

CURATE, curator.] He who represents the incumbent of a church, parson, or vicar, and takes care of divine service in his stead: 1813, and in case only of the non-residence of clergyman is old and infirm, it is requisite there should be a curate to perform the cure of the church. He is to be licensed and admitted by the bishop of the diocese, or by an ordinary having episcopal jurisdiction; and when a curate hath the approbation of the bishop, he usually appoints the salary too; and in such case, if he be not paid, the curate hath a proper remedy in the Ecclesiastical Court, by a sequestration of the profits of the benefice; but if he hath no licence from the bishop, he is put to his remedy at common law, where he must prove the agreement, &c. Right Clerg. 127.

By stat. 28 H. 8. c. 11. such as serve a church during its vacancy shall be paid such stipend as the ordinary thinks reasonable out of the profits of the vacancy; or, if that be not sufficient, by the successor, within fourteen days after he takes possession.

By stat. 12 Anne, c. 12. where curates are licensed by the bishop, they are to be appointed by him at a stipend not exceeding 50l. per. ann. nor less than 201. a year, according to the value of the livings, to be paid by the rector or vicar; and the same may be done on any complaint made.

By stat. 36 G. 3. c. 83. § 1. the bishop or ordinary may appoint a stipend to curates of 751. per ann. with the use of the parsonage house, or allowance for it where the rector or vicar does not personally reside.

Churches augmented by Queen Anne's bounty shall be deemed benefices presentive, and the officiating curate may have a like stipend. Id. § 3, 4.

Bishop or ordinary may apportion the stipend to officiating curates of perpetual cu-racies not augmented. Id. § 5.

Ordinary may license curates employed, though no nomination shall have been made to him by the incumbent, and may revoke any licence subject to appeal to the archbishop of the province. Id. § 6.

§ 3. and 4. of this act, 36 G. 3. c. 83. were by the 47 G. 3. st. 2. c. 25. suspended (so far as related to the avoidance of benefices by the acceptance of augmented curacies). But this act of suspension was repealed by stat.

48 G. 3. c. 5.

Certain provisions were made by stat. 53. G. 3. c. 149. for the support &c. of stipendiary curates. These were repealed, and more effectual regulations made by 57 G. 3. c. 99. § 1. 48. &c. Under this latter act, the bishops are empowered to license curates and to assign them salaries, in no case less than 80l. a year, and increasing up to 150l. according to the population of the parish, &c. The occupation of the parsonage house may in certain cases be assigned to the curate, who is not to quit his curacy without three months' notice to the incumbent and the bishop. These regulations are to operate on persons having become incumbents after 20th July, the incumbent on his living for more than being resident on his benefice, and disthree months in the year. See farther Parson, Residence.

One person cannot be curate in two churches, unless such may satisfy the law by reading both morning and evening prayers at each place; nor can he serve one cure on one Sunday and another cure on the next; for he must not neglect to read morning and evening prayer in his church every Lord's Day; if he doth he is liable to punishment. Comp. Incumb. 572. But it is otherwise where a church or chapel is a member of the parish church, and where one church is not able to maintain a curate. Can. 48. See now stat. 57 G. 3, c. 99.

A curate having no fixed estate in his curacy, not being instituted and inducted, may be removed at pleasure by the bishop or incumbent. Noy. But there are perpetual curates, as well as temporary, who are appointed where tithes are impropriate, and no vicarage endowed; these are not removeable; and the improprietors are obliged to find them, some whereof have certain portions of the tithes settled on them. Stat. 29 Car. 2. c. 8. See tit. Parson.

It was provided in 1603 by Can. 33, that if a bishop ordains any person not provided with some ecclesiastical preferment, except a fellow or chaplain of a college, or a master of arts of five years' standing, who lives in the university at his own expence, the bishop shall support him till he prefer him to a living. 3 Burn. Eccl. L. 28. The bishops, before they confer orders, require either proof of such a title as is described by the canon, or a certificate from some rector or vicar, promising to employ the candidate for orders bona fide as a curate, and to grant him a certain allowance till he obtains some ecclesiastical preferment, or shall be removed for some fault. In a case where the rector of St. Anne, Westminster, gave such a title, and afterwards dismissed his curate without assigning any cause, the curate recovered in an action of assumpsit the same salary for the time after his dismission which he had received be-Cowp. 437. When the rector had vacated St. Anne's by accepting the living of Rochdale, the curate brought another action to recover his salary after the rector left St. Anne's: but the Court of K. B. held that that action could not be maintained, as these titles are only binding upon those who give them, while they continue incumbents in the church for which such curate is appointed. Doug.

No curate (or minister) ought to perform , the duties of any church before he has obtained a licence from the bishop. 2 Burn. 58.

The bishop cannot increase the salary of the curate, where there is a specific agreement between the incumbent and the curate. Freem. 70. It is sometimes taken for the persons, as feudatory and other customary tenants, who did their suit and service at the court of the lord. Kennet's Paroch. Antiq. 139. And it was usual for the kings of England, in ancient times, to assemble the bishops, peers, and great men of the kingdom to some particular place, at the chief festivals in the year; and this assembly is called by our historians curia. And it was called solemnis curia, augustalis curia, curia publica, &c. See tits. Court. Wittenagemote.

CURRENCY. The stat. 6 G. 4. c. 79. enacts that the currency of Great Britain shall become and be the currency of the United Kingdom. All receipts, payments, contracts, and dealings shall be made according to such currency, and shall be held to be so made, unless the contrary be proved. § 1. All contracts, debts, &c. in Irish currency, made or contracted previous to January 5, 1826, shall be carried into effect, and satisfied by payment in British currency of 12-13ths of the amount according to Irish currency. § 2. All duties and public revenues, and all funds and public debts, shall be estimated in British currency, and the accounts thereof kept accordingly. § 3. But not to affect the real value in gold or silver coin of the public revenues, or of any sums in any act of parliament, or any franchise, &c., resulting from lands of any specified value. § 4. To provide for the payment of fractions of a penny, British currency, resulting from the conversion of Irish currency into British. § 5.—and for payment, in British copper coin, of sums under 12d. Irish currency. § 5-13. On converting Irish stock into British, all pence and fractions of 1d. of the principal sum shall be paid with the dividends at the Bank of Ireland. § 6, 7. Where annual sums charged on consolidated fund in Irish currency are converted into British, the Treasury may add sufficient to prevent fractions of a penny. § 8. Contracts may be made according to any foreign currency. § 9. Debts, &c. by implication of law, declared within the meaning of the act. § 10. On proclamation, British silver and gold coins shall be current in Ireland at the same rate of pence as in Great Britain, and not according to the rate of Irish copper coin. § 11. And Irish copper coin shall be brought to the bank of Ireland, and exchanged for British copper coin, at the rate of 12d. British for 13d. Irish, and the Irish copper coin shall cease to circulate. § 12. Publication of act, and explanation thereof, and tables of currency may be distributed by order of the Treasury. § 16.

CURTESY OF ENGLAND, jus carialitatis Angliæ.] Is where a man taketh a wife seised in fee-simple, or fee-tail general, or as heiress in special tail, and hath issue by her, male or female born alive, which by any possibility may inherit, and the wife dies, the husband holds the lands during his life, and is called Tenens per legem Angliæ, or tenant by the curtesy of England. See tit. Tenares, III. 9. Though this is called the curtery of England, it appears to have been the established law of Scotland, where it was called curialitas. It is likewise used in Ireland, by virtue of an ordinance of Henry III. So that probably the word curtesy is in this sense understood rather to signify an attendance upon the lord's courts, than to denote any peculiar favour. See 2 Com. 126.

Four things are requisite to give an estate by the curtesy, viz., marriage, seisin of the wife, issue, and death of the wife. Co. Lit. If the land descend to the wife after the husband hath issue by her, or if the issue be dead at the time of her death, being born alive, the husband shall be tenant by the cur-Also if a child is born alive, it is not material whether it is baptized, or ever heard to cry, to make the husband tenant by the curtesy: for if it is born alive, it is enough.

Dy. 25: 8 Rep. 34.

But the child must be such as by possibility may inherit: and therefore if land be given to a woman, and the heirs male of her body, and she takes husband, and hath issue a daughter, and dies, as this issue cannot possibly inherit, the husband shall not be tenant by the curtesy. Terms de la Ley.

If the child is ripped forth of the mother's belly, after her death, though it be alive, it will not cause tenancy by the curtesy; for this ought to begin by the issue, and be consummate by the death of the wife, and the estate of tenant by the curtesy should aroid the immediate descent. Ibid. A man shall not be tenant by the curtesy of a bare right, title, use, reversion, &c., expectant upon an estate of freehold, unless the particular estate is determined during the coverture; nor of a seisin in law: but if a wife dies before a rent becomes due, or in the case of an advowson, before the church becomes void, the husband shall be tenant by the curtesy, though the wife had only a seisin in law; for in this case no other seisin could be attained. F. N. B. 149: Co. Int. 29, 30. 40.

Though in strictness of law there cannot be curtesy of trusts, yet since Lord Coke's time, our courts of equity have allowed curtesy, both of trusts and other interests, which, though in law mere rights and titles, are 4 Ed. 1. c. 1: 35 H. 8. c. 4: 6 Rep. 64: and deemed estates in equity; and made to conform to many of the rules and consequences incident to estates in law. See in 1 Atk. 603. the case of Cashbourn v. English, in which Hardwicke, C. decreed curtery of an equity of redemption. See S. C. more fully reported in Vin. tit. Curtesy, (E.) pl. 23. However a wife may in point of benefit have a trust of inheritance, which may be so declared as to prevent curtesy; as by directing the profits, during the wife's life, to be paid for her separate use; for in such case the intention to exclude the husband from curtesy is manifest, and he cannot have an equitable seisin. 3 Atk. 715. It is also proper to remark, that though curtesy out of a trust is allowed. yet dower has been refused, a distinction not easily reconcileable with reason, however settled by the current of authorities. See 1 Inst. 29. a.: n. 6.

As to curtesy in titles and offices of honour, see 1 Inst. 29. b. and Mr. Hargrave's learned notes there, by which it seems that no such curtesy can take place, though the question appears not to be settled, a decision having been repeatedly avoided thereon.

There is no tenancy by the curtesy of copy-hold lands, except there be a special custom But in gavelkind lands, a husband may be tenant by the curtesy without having issue. 1 Inst. 30. But it is only of a moiety of the wife's land, and ceases if the husband marries again. Robins. Gavelk. l. 2. c. 1. Where a husband is entitled to this tenancy, if after the wife is an idiot, and her estate in the land found; when she dies he shall not be tenant by the curtesy, for the king's title by relation prevents it. Plowd. 263. If the wife be seised in fee of lands, and attaint of felony, but have issue by her husband, and she is hanged, &c., it is said the husband shall be a tenant by the curtesy, but yet the land will be forfeited, according to Kitch. 159. 21 Ed. 3. c. 49.

A woman seised of land had two daughters, and covenanted to stand seised to the use of E., her eldest daughter in tail, on condition that she should pay to her other daughter within a certain time 300l. And if E. made default, or died without issue before such payment, then the land to go to the second daughter; the mother dying, E. took a husband, and had issue, and died afterwards without any issue living, before the day of payment: it was here held that her husband should be tenant by the curtesy. 1 Leon. ca. CUSTODIAM or CUSTODIAM LEASE. A lease from the crown, under the seal of the Exchequer, by which the custody of lands, &c. seized into the king's hands, is demised or committed to some person as custodee or lessee thereof. See 4 Inst. c. 11. f. 111: Howard on the Irish Revenue.

These custodians take place (chiefly in Ireland) either in the case of debts due to the crown, and of grants by the crown, of lands, rectories, tithes, &c.; or upon outlawries in civil suits between party and party; when lands and tenements of the party outlawed (after an inquisition taken upon a special capias utlagatum and returned into the Exchequer) are committed (during pleasure) to the custody of the plaintiff for satisfying his debt, under a nominal rent of 5s. in cases of debt, and 10s. in cases of trespass, payable to the crown. See Conroy's Custodiam Reports (Dublin, 1795), and this Dict. tit. Outlawry.

CUSTOM, consuctudo.] Is a law not written, established by long usage, and the consent of our ancestors. No law can oblige a free people without their consent; so wherever they consent and use a certain rule or method as a law, such rule, &c. gives it the

it is common law: if particular to this or that, first put in his, is unreasonable, and therefore place, then it is custom. 3 Salk. 112. As to the rise of customs, when a reasonable act once done was found to be good and beneficial to the people, then they did use it often, and, by frequent repetition of the act, it became a custom; which being continued without interruption time out of mind, it obtained the force of a law, to bind the particular places, persons, and things concerned therein. Thus a custom had beginning, and grew to perfection.

To make a particular custom good, the following are necessary requisites.

1. Antiquity.—That it have been used so long, that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. So that if any one can show the beginning of it, within legal memory, that is within any time since the first year of Richard I., it is no good custom. For which reason no custom can prevail against an express act of parliament, since the statute itself is a proof of a time when such a custom did not exist. Co. Lit. 113. Therefore a custom that every pound of butter sold in a certain market, should weigh eighteen ounces, is bad; not left to the option of every man, whether being directly contrary to stat. 13 and 14 Car. he will use them or no. Therefore a custom 2. c. 26., which directs it to contain sixteen ounces. 3 Term Rep. 271.

2. It must have been continued. Any interruption would cause a temporary ceasing: the revival gives it a new beginning, which will be within time of memory, and there-upon the custom will be void. But this must be understood with regard to an interruption of the right; for an interruption of the possession only for ten or twenty years will not destroy the custom. Co. Lit. 114. As if the inhabitants of a parish have a customary right of watering their cattle at a certain pool, the custom is not destroyed, though they do not use it for ten years; it only becomes more difficult to prove: but if the right be any how discontinued for a day, the custom is quite at

3. It must have been peaceable, and acquiesced in; not subject to contention and dispute. Co. Lit. 114. For as customs owe their original to common consent, their being immemorially disputed, either at law or otherwise, is a proof that such consent was wanting.

4. Customs must be reasonable (Lit. § 212.). or rather, taken negatively, they must not be unréasonable. Which is not always, as Sir Edward Coke says (1 Inst. 62.), to be understood of every unlearned man's reason, but of artificial and legal reason, warranted by authority of law. Upon which account a custom may be good, though the particular reason of it cannot be assigned; for it sufficeth, if no legal reason can be assigned against it. Thus a custom in a parish, that no man shall put his beasts into the common till the third of October, would be good; and yet it would be hard to show the reason why that day in particular is fixed upon, rather than the day before or after. But a custom that no cattle shall succeed to those lands alone. Co. Lit. shall be put in till the lord of the manor has 15. See tit. King.

bad; for peradventure the lord will never put in his; and then the tenants will lose all their profits. Co. Copyh. § 33.

5. Customs ought to be certain. A custom, that lands shall descend to the most worthy of the owner's blood, is void: for how shall this worth be determined? But a custom to descend to the next male of the blood, exclusive of females, is certain, and therefore good. 1 Rol. Abr. 565. A custom to pay two-pence an acre in lieu of tithes, is good; but to pay sometimes two-pence, and sometimes threepence, as the occupier of the land pleases, is bad, for its uncertainty. Yet a custom to pay a year's improved value for a fine on a copyhold estate, is good: though the value is a thing uncertain; for the value may be ascertained at any time; and the maxim of law is, id certum est quod certum reddi potest .-A custom that poor housekeepers shall carry too vague. 2 Term Rep. 758.

6. Customs, though established by consent, must be (when established) compulsory; and that all the inhabitants shall be rated toward the maintenance of a bridge, will be good; but a custom that every man is to contribute thereto at his own pleasure is idle and absurd;

7. Lastly, customs must be consistent with each other: one custom cannot be set up in opposition to another. For if both are really both established by mutual consent; which to say of contradictory customs is absurd. Therefore if one man prescribes that by custom he has a right to have windows looking into another's garden, the other cannot claim a right by custom to stop up or obstruct those windows: for these two contradictory customs cannot both be good, nor both stand together. former custom. 9 Rep. 58. See Dong, 190.

As to the allowance of special customs. Customs in derogation of the common law must be construed strictly. This rule is founded upon the consideration that a variety of customs in different places upon the same subject is a general inconvenience: the courts therefore will not admit such customs, but upon the clearest proofs. 1 Term Rep. 466. Thus by the custom of gavelkind, an infant of fifteen years may by one species of conveyance (called a deed of fooffment) convey away his lands in fee-simple. Yet this custom does not empower him to use any other conveyance, or even to lease them for seven years, for the custom must be strictly pursued. C. Cap. § 33. All special customs must yield to the king's prerogative. Therefore if the king purchases land of the nature of gavelkind, where all the sons inherit equally; yet on the king's demise, his eldest son

But though customs are to be construed fore void: and where custom is amongst strictly, yet, says Lord Coke, they are not to be confined to literal interpretation; for if there be a custom within any manor that copyhold lands may be granted in fee-simple, under that custom they may be granted to one and the heirs of his body, or for life or years or any estate whatever; on the maxim cui licet quod majus non debet quod minus est non by a jury. A custom alleged by churchwardens of a parish to set up monuments, &c., in a church, without the consent either of the rector or ordinary, declared to be illegal. Beckwith v. Harding, 1 Barn. & A. 508.

An immemorial custom to have no churchwardens, and for the duties of the office to be performed by overseers of the poor, is bad, for overseers have not existed immemorially, and there must have been always duties for churchwardens to perform. 2 Barn. & Adol. 197. A custom that there shall be a select vestry of an indefinite number of persons continued by election of new members made by itself, and not by parishoners, is valid in law. Barn. & C. 765.

A custom may be good in some cases where a prescription is not: but customs that are good for the substance and matter of them, may yet be bad for the manner: if they are uncertain, or mixed with any other custom that is unreasonable, &c. 2 Bulst. 166: 2 Brownl. 198.

The law takes particular notice of the custom of Gavelkind and Borough English (Co. Lit. 175.); and there is no occasion to prove that such customs actually exist, but only that the lands in question are subject thereto. All other private customs must be particularly pleaded (Lit. § 265.); and as well the existence of the custom must be shown, as that the thing in dispute is within the custom alleged. The trial in both cases is by a jury of twelve men, and not by the judges, except the same particular custom has before been tried, determined and recorded in the same court. By these we understand at present a duty or subsidy paid by the merchant, at the quay, upon imported as well as exported commodities, by authority of parliament; unles where, for particular national reasons, certain rewards, bounties, or drawbacks, are allowed first granted, as the old statutes (and particularly 1 Eliz. 19.) express it, for the defence of the realm, and the keeping and safeguard the same. They were at first usually granted half to the public revenue. only for a stated term of years, as, for two Sixth's time, they were granted him for life by a statute in the thirty-first year of his reign; and again to Edward IV. for the term of his life also: since which time they were life, sometimes at the first, sometimes at other subsequent parliaments, till the reign of Charles the First.

Upon the restoration, this duty was granted in England to King Charles the Second for mer acts relating to the customs, as well of life, and so it was to his two immediate sucthe Irish as British legislature, preparatory to cessors; and by three several stats. 9 Anne, c. the enacting a new system applicable to the 6: 1 G. 1. c. 12: 3 G. 1. c. 7; it was made whole of the United Kingdom. He makes entry likewise of all writs of covenant, and the concord upon every fine, and maketh forth exemplifications, and copies of all writs and records in his office, and of all fines levied.

The fines after they are engrossed are divided between the custos brevium and the chirographer; the chirographer always keeps the writ of covenant and the note, and the custos brevium the concord and the foot of the fine; upon which foot of the fine the chirographer causeth the proclamations to be indorsed, when they are proclaimed. This officer is made by the king's letters patent, which were first granted by Charles II. in the twentyninth year of his reign, to trustees for the Earl and Countess of Litchfield, and for the issue of the Countess in tail. The persons at present entitled to the office acquired it by inheritance. By 6 G. 4. c. 89. the Treasury is authorised to contract with the persons beneficially entitled to the fees and profits of the office for the purchase of their rights for such annuity, charged on the consolidated fund, as the Treasury shall think fit, and after the confirmation of the agreement by parliament, the rights of the parties shall cease, and the annuity shall be paid to such person or persons as would be entitled to the fees, &c., if the act had not been made. See 1 W. 4. c. 58. In the Court of King's Bench there is also a custus brevium et rotulorum, who fileth such writs as are in that court filed, and all warrants of attorney, &c., and whose business it is to make out the records of nisi prius, &c. II. How Damages are to be assessed, increased, and mitigated.—In real actions damages are assessed by writ of inquiry; when the jury find the issue for the plaintiff, they are to assess the damages. And in actions upon the case, &c., where damages are uncertain, it is left to the jury to inquire of them. what it is, the damages assessed by the jury ling; and the master in B. If action is brought for two several causes of action, one of which is not actionable, if entire damages are given the verdict is void; contra if the damages are severed. And where damages are entirely assessed, and they ought not to be given for some part, no judgment can be given on the verdict. 10 Rep. 130. But if the damages can be apportioned by reference to the judge's notes, so that he can say what damages are given for the good cause of action, the plaintiff may abandon the rest, and the objection is cured. Tidd's Prac. 919. Where damages are awarded for delay of execution, and being kept out of the money, they are usually assessed by allowing the party what lawful interesthe might have. 1 Salk. 208.

For money lent, interest shall be given from the time the money was payable to the time of liquidating the debt, by the court's giving judgment. 2 Burr. 1081. 6. So, on a bill of exchange, it is usual to calculate the interest up to the time when judgment may be entered up. And it is now settled, as a general rule, that where a new action may be brought, and a new satisfaction obtained on that, for duties or demands arisen since the commencement of the depending suit, these shall not be included in the judgment on the former action. But where the interest is an accessory to the principal, and the plaintiff cannot bring a new action for interest grown due between the commencement of the action and judgment, it shall be included. In what case the plaintiff shall have no more costs than damages, unless the jury finds more than 40s., see tit. Costs.

In action upon the case, the jury may find less damages than the plaintiff lays in his declaration, but ought not to find more, though costs may be increased beyond the sum mentioned in the declaration for damages. The plaintiff may release part of the damages upon entering up his judgment. 10 Rep. 115. If he does not, but takes judgment for damages (exclusive of costs) to a larger amount than laid in the declaration, it is error, and not within any of the statutes of amendment or jeofails. In debt against a sheriff or gaoler for an escape, the jury cannot give a less sum than the creditor would have recovered against the prisoner, viz. the sum indorsed on the writ, and the legal fees of execution. 2 Term Rep. 126.

But in an action upon the stat. 8 H. 6. c. 9. of forcible entry, which giveth treble damages, the plaintiff shall recover his damages and his costs to the treble amount, by reason he was entitled to single damages before by the common law; and the statute, as part of the dam. ages, increases the costs to treble; and when

A deed was dated 30th March, 1701, without anno Domini and anno Regni; and it was adjudged that both the year of the Lord and of the king were implicitly in the deed. 2 Salk. 658. A deed is good though it hath no date of the day or place, or if the date be mistaken, or though it hath an impossible date, as the 30th of February, &c. But he that doth plead such a deed without any date, or with an impossible date, must set forth the time when it was delivered. 2 Rep. 5: 1 Inst. 46. Sec 2 East, 195. 10th ed. 139. If no date of a deed be set forth, it shall be intended that it had none; and in such case it is good from the delivery, for every deed or writing hath a date in law, and that is the day in which it is delivered; and a deed is no deed till the delivery, and that is the date of it. Mod. Ca. 244: 1 Nels. Abr. 525.

An impossible date of a bond, &c., is no date at all; but the plaintiff must declare on the bond as made at a certain time; and if the express date be insensible, the real date is the delivery. 2 Salk. 463. DATE IN CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS. The stat. 7 G. . c. 64. § 20. enacts that no judgment upon an indictment on information for felony or misdemeanor, after verdict or outlawry, by confession, default, or otherwise, shall be stayed or reversed for omitting to state the time at which the offence was committed (where time is not of the essence of the offence), nor for stating the offence imperfectly, nor for stating the offence to have been committed on a day subsequent to the finding of the indictment, or exhibiting the information, or on an signed; but generally in assises the judges impossible day, or on a day that never hap may give a special day at their pleasure, and pened. DAY, dies.] A certain space of time, containing twenty-four hours; and if a fact he done in the night, you must state it in law proceedings, in the night of the same day. Thus, in burglary, if the offence be done in the night before midnight, the indictment should lay it to be the night of that day, which ended at midnight; and if it happen after midnight, then the night of the day after. Lamb. Eiren. book. 4. cap. 5. p. 465. The reason of which appears to be, that the astronocal day commences at 12 o'clock at noon, but the common or civil day at 12 o'clock at night.

The English, French, Dutch, Germans, Spaniards, Portuguese, and Egyptians, begin their day at midnight; the Jews, with the modern Italians and Chinese, begin it at sunsetting; the ancient Babylonians, Persians, Syrians, and the modern Greeks, at sunrising; and the Arabians, and modern astronomers, begin it at noon. Turner's Introduction to Arts and Sciences. p. 69. The natural day consists of twenty-four hours, and contains the solar day and the night: and the artificial day begins from the rising of the sun, and ends when it sets. See 1 Inst. 135. Day, in legal understanding, is the day of appearance of the parties, or continuance of the suit where a day is given, &c. And there is a day of appearance in court by the writ and by the roll; by writ, when the sheriff returns the writ; by roll, when he hath a day by the roll, and the sheriff returns not the writ, there the defendant, to save his freehold, and prevent loss of issues, imprisonment, &c., may appear by the day he hath by the roll. Co. Lit. 135.

In real actions there are dies communes, common days; and in all summonses there must be fifteen days after the summons before the appearance; and before the statute of articuli super chartas, in all summons and attachment in plea of land, there should be contained fifteen days. Co. Lit. 134.

As to offences in B. R., if the offence be committed in another county than where the court sits, and the indictment be removed by certiorari, there must be fifteen days between every process and the return thereof; but if it be committed in the same county where the bench sits, they may sit de die in diem; but this they will very rarely do. Ibid. There is a day called dies specialis, as in an assise in the King's Bench or Common Pleas, the attachment need not be fifteen days before the appearance, otherwise it is before justices asare not bound to the common days; and these days they may give as well out of term as special memorandum of some particular day,

There is also a day of grace, dies gratiæ; and generally this is granted by the court at the prayer of the demandant or plaintiff, in whose delay it is; but it is never granted where the king is party, by aid prior of the tenant or defendant; nor where any lord of parliament, or peer of the realm, is tenant or defendant.

And sometimes the day that is quarto die post, is called dies gratiæ, for the very day of return is the day in law, and to that day the judgment hath relation, but no default shall be recorded till the fourth day be past; unless it be in a writ of right, where the law alloweth no day but the day of the return. See tit. Judgment, Term, Time.

Days in Bank are days set down by statute, or order of the court, when writs shall be returned, or when the party shall appear upon the writ served. See stat. 51 H. 3, st. 2 and 3. [or rather of uncertain time]: 32 H. 8. c. 21: 16 Car. 1. c. 6: and 24 G. 2. c. 48. And by the stat. de anno Bissextili, 21 [or 40, or 44,] H. 3. the day increasing in the leap year and the day next going before are to be accounted but one day.

It is commonly said that the day of nisi prius, and the day in bank, is all one day; but this is to be understood as to pleading, not to other purposes. 1 Inst. 135. But after issue found for the plaintiff at the nisi prius, if a day be given in bank, and the defendant makes default, judgment shall be given against him. 2 Danv. Abr. 447: and vide Ibid.

To be dismissed without day, is to be finally dismissed the court; and when the justices before whom causes were depending do not come on the day to which they were continued, whether such absence be occasioned by death or otherwise, they are said to be put without day; but may be revived, or re-continued, by re-summons, re-attachment, &c. See stat. I Ed. 6. c. 7. Also, by the common law, all proceedings upon any indictment, &c. whereon no judgment had been given, were determined by the demise of the king, and nothing remained but the indictment, original writ, &c. which were put without day, till recontinued by re-attachment to bring in the defendants to plead de novo; though this is remedied by stats. 4 and 5 W. 3. c. 18; 1 Anne, c. 8; by which such process, &c. are to continue in the same force after the king's demise as they would have done if he had lived. DAY-WRIT, or RULE. A rule or order of court, permitting a prisoner in custody in the King's Bench prison, &c., to go without the bounds of his prison for one day. By a rule of the Court of K. B. Easter 30 G. 3. a prisoner shall not have day-rules above three days in each term; and shall return to prison before nine in the evening.

But by a rule of that court in Michaelmas 37 G. 3., if any person state, by affidavit, any special cause, to the satisfaction of the court, for having an additional day-rule, it may be granted accordingly.

However, by rule of Hil. 45 G. 3. it was ordered that the rules of East. 30 G. 3. and Michaelmas, 37 G. 3. should both be repealed, except as to the regulation that every prisoner, having a day-rule, should return within before nine in the evening. See Debtors.

The king may grant writ of warrantia diei to any person which shall save his default for one day, be it in plea of land or other action, and be the cause true, or not; and this by his prerogative, quod nota.

DAYERIA, dairy, from day, dieie, Sax. dag.] Was at first the daily yield of milch cows, or profit made of them. In Lorrain and Champaign they use the word dayer, for the meeting of the day-labouring people to give an account of their daily work, and receive the wages of it. Considered in respect of the difference of DEAFFORESTED, or DISAFFOREST. office, deans are of six kinds. 1. Deans of when a warren is diswarrened or broke up tit. Chapters. 2. Deans of Peculiars, who d laid in common.

DEAN, decanus, from the greek Δε΄κα, souls, as the Dean of Battel, in Sussex; and decem.] An ecclesiastical governor or digni- sometimes jurisdiction only, as the Dean of tary, so called, as he presides over ten canons the Arches in London (see tit. Arches Court), or prebendaries at the least. And we call him and the Deans of Bocking, in Essex, and of a dean, that is, next under the bishop, and Croydon, in Surrey. 3. Rural Deans, who chief of the chapter, ordinarily in a cathedral had first jurisdiction over deaneries, as every church, the rest of the society being called diocese is divided into archdeaconries and As there are two deaneries; but afterwards their power was foundations of cathedral churches in England, diminished, and they were only the bishops' the old and the new (the new erected by King substitutes to grant letters of administration, Henry VIII.) so there are two means of cre-ating these deans; for those of the old foun-wholly extinguished, for the archdeacons and dation, as the Dean of St. Paul's, York, &c. chancellors of bishops execute the authority which rural deans had through all the dioceses the king first sending out his congé d'elire to of England. 1 Nels. See Lyndw. Gibs. 1 Inst. 95. (a.) in n.

holy orders.

In respect of the manner of appointment, deans are, 1. Elective, as deans of chapters of the old foundation; though they are only so (like bishops) nominally, and in form, the king being, in fact, the real patron. 2. Donative, as those deans of chapters of the new foundation who are appointed by the king's letters patent, and are installed under his command to the chapter, without resorting to the bishop either for admission or for a mandate of instalment; if that mode of promoting still prevails in respect to any of the new deaneries. Deans of the royal chapels are also donative, the king appointing to them in the same way. So, too, may deans of peculiars, without cure of souls, be called; as the Dean of Arches, who is appointed by commission from the Archbishop of Canterbury; but this must be understood in a large sense of the word donative, it being most usually restrained to spiritual promotions. 3. Presentative, as some deans of peculiars with cure of souls, and the deans of some chapters of the new foundation, if not all. Thus the Dean of Battel is presented by the patron to the Bishop of Chichester, and from him receives institution. This deanery was founded by William the Conqueror. He hath ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the liberty of Battel, and is presentable by the Duke of Montague; and, though instituted and inducted by the Bishop of Chicester, is not subject to his visitation. 1 Nels. Abr. Thus, too, the Dean of Gloucester is presented by the king to the bishop, with a mandate to admit him, and to give orders for his instalment. 4. By virtue of another office; as the Bishop of London is dean of the province of Canterbury, and the Bishop of St. David's is dean of his own chapter.

As to farther particulars relative to the manner of coming to the possession of deaneries, see a long and learned historical account in 1 Inst. 95. (a.) n. 4. from which it appears that the right to appoint deans of cathedral and collegiate churches, and the mode of appointing them, must generally depend almost wholly upon charters, usage, or acts of parliament; and if a case should, by bare possibility, arise, where neither of those rules could be had recourse to, foundership seems the only true criterion of patronage.

In respect of the manner of holding, deans are either absolute or in commendam; but this applies only to spiritual deaneries. It is said there are also deputy deans. A commendatory dean may, with the chapter, choose a bishop; and if a dean be elected bishop, and before consecration doth obtain dispensation to hold his deanery in commendam, such dean may well confirm, &c., for his old title remains, and therefore confirmations, and other acts done by him as dean, are good in law. may be, and frequently are, persons not in | cil, to assist him in the affairs of religion, &c., to consult in deciding difficult controversies. and consent to every grant which the bishop shall make to bind his successors, &c.

A dean that is solely seized of a distinct possession, hath an absolute fee in him as well as a bishop. 1 Inst. 125. A deanery is a spiritual promotion, and not a temporal one, though the dean be appointed by the king; and the dean and chapter may be in part secular, and in part regular. Dyer, 10: Palm. 500. As a deanery is a spiritual dignity, a man cannot be dean and prebendary in the same church. Dyer, 273.

DEBATING SOCIETIES. By stat. 60 G. 3 c. 6. § 26. &c., all places for giving public lectures or debates for the purpose of raising money, or where money, &c., shall be taken for admission, are declared disorderly, unless licensed by two justices at sessions. Penalty on persons refusing such admission, 201. Such places may be yearly licensed by justices at sessions on payment of ls.; and such license may be revoked in the discretion of the justices. Justices may visit such li-censed places at the time of lecture. Lectures in the Universities, Inns of Court, Gresham College, the East India College, &c., and all incorporated societies, and school-masters, are excepted. License may be voided by two justices of the peace, if the place is commonly used for lectures of a seditious, irreligious, or immoral tendency. Prosecutions under the act are limited to six months after the offence; as are also actions against magistrates for any thing done in execution of the act. This statute has recently expired. DE BENE ESSE. To take or to do any thing de bene esse, is to accept or allow it as well done for the present; but when it comes to be more fully examined or tried, to stand or fall according to the merit of the thing in its own nature. As in Chancery, upon motion the person or his real or personal estate, in to have one of the less principal defendants in execution, i. e. the moiety of his real estate, or a cause examined as a witness, the court (not the whole of the personal, if not more than then thoroughly examining the justice of it, sufficient for repayment of the sum recovered or not hearing what may be objected on the and charges. other side) will often order such a defendant. In the legs

Where a complainant's witnesses are aged plaintiff thinks he is in danger of loosing their testimony, the court will order them to be examined de bene esse; so as to be valid, if the plaintiff hath not an opportunity of examining them afterwards; as if they die before answer. or do not return, &c. In either of which cases the depositions may be made use of in the Court of Chancery or at law: but if parties are alive and well, or do return, &c. after answer, these depositions are not to be of force, for the witnesses must be re-examined.

So also at common law, the judges frequently take bail de bene esse, that is, to be allowed or disallowed upon the exception or approbation of the plaintiff's attorney; however, in the interim, they are good, or have a conditional allowance. Cowel. Declarations likewise are sometimes delivered de bene esse. By rule of Trinity Term, 1831, no declaration de bene esse shall be delivered until the expiration of six days from the service of process, where not bailable, or until six days from the arrest, where bailable. Actions of debt were formerly seldom brought but upon special contracts under seal; wherein the sum due was clearly and precisely expressed; for in case of such an action upon a simple contract, the plaintiff laboured under two difficulties; first, the defendant had there the same advantage as in an action of detinue, that of waging his law, or purging himself of the debt by oath, if he thought proper. 4 Rep. 94. > Whatever the laws order any one to pay, that becomes instantly a debt, which he hath beforehand contracted to discharge. And this implied agreement it is that gives the plaintiff a right to institute a second action founded merely on the general contract, in order to recover such damages, or sum of money, as are assessed by the jury, and adjudged by the court to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff in any former action. So that if he hath once obtained a judgment against another for a certain sum, and neglects to take out execution thereupon, he may afterwards bring an action of debt upon this judgment; 1 Rol. Abr. 600, 1; and shall not be put upon the proof of the original cause of action; but upon showing the judgment once obtained, still in full force, and yet unsatisfied, the law immediately implies, that by the original contract of society the defendant hath contracted a debt, and is bound to pay. This method seems to have been invented when real actions were more in use than at present, and damages were permitted to be recovered thereon, in order to have the benefit of a writ of capias, to take the defendant's body in execution for those damages: which process was allowable in an action of debt (in consean action real. Wherefore, since the disuse of those real actions, actions of debt upon judgment in personal suits have been pretty much discountenanced by the courts, as beactions instead of one. 3 Comm. 160.

II. Where it shall be brought in the debet and definet, and where in the definet only.-The form of the writ of debt is sometimes in the debet and detinet, and sometimes in the detinet only; that is, the writ states, either that the defendant owes, and unjustly detains the debt or thing in question, or only that he unjustly detains it. It is brought in the debt, as well as detinet, where sued by one of the original contracting parties who personally gave the credit, against the other who personally incurred the debt, or against his heirs, if they are bound to the payment; as by the obligee against the obligor, the landlord against the tenant, &c. But, if it be brought by, or against, an executor for a debt due to or from the testator, this, not being his own debt, shall be sued for in the detinet only. F. N. B. 119. So also if the action be for goods, for corn, or an horse, the writ shall be in the detinet only; for nothing but a sum of money, for which I (or my ancestors in my name) have personally contracted, is properly considered as my debt. And indeed a writ of debt in the detinet only, for goods and chattels, is neither more nor less than a mere writ of detinue; and is followed by the very same judgment. Rast. Entr. 174: 3 Comm. 156.

In debt for the arrears of an annuity granted for life nil debet is no good plea, for the action is merely tounded upon the deed, for without it no action can be maintained; and though by the death of the grantee the nature of the action is changed, the annuity being determined; yet this proves not but that the action is founded upon the deed.

DEBTEE-EXECUTOR. Sectit. Executor. DEBTORS. A work of the nature of this dictionary is by no means adapted to political disquisitions on the propriety of imprisonment for debt-nor to historical details of the proceedings of foreign nations on the subject. The legislature, who are the proper, and indeed the only legal judges, of what regulations on the subject are necessary, have unfortunate debtors (too generally a small part of the number confined) by insolvent acts; and the liberty of the subject in this particular, has in the present reign been much favoured by the laws relative to Arrest. DECEIT, deceptio.] A subtle trick or devise, whereunto may be referred all manner of craft and collusion, used to deceive and defraud another, by any means whatsoever, which hath no other or more proper name than deceit to extinguish the offence. West. Symb. § 68.

There is a writ called the WRIT OF DECEIT the name of another person; by which he is deceived or injured; which writ is either orihis life, his heir shall be discharged of the ginal or judicial. Reg. Orig. 112: Old Nat. debt. Stat. 27 Eliz. c. 3. See also stat 25. Br. 50. But an action on the case is now the usual remedy for injuries arising from deceit | forth the writ of capias, &c. And if a person of another. See Bac. Ab. (7th ed.) tit. Action on the Case.

Deceit is an offence at common law, and by statute: and all practices of defrauding or endeavouring to defraud another of his right, are punishable by fine and imprisonment; and if for cheating in some cases by transportation. See tit. Cheats, Fraud, False Pretences, Indictment, IV. Serjeants, counsellors, attorneys, and others, doing any manner of deceit, are to be imprisoned a year and a day; also pleaders by deceit shall be expelled the court. Stat. 3 Ed. 1. c. 29.

If a fine be levied by deceit, or if one recover land by deceit, the fine and the recovery shall be void. 3 Rep. 77. And if a man be attorney for another in a real action against the demandant, and afterwards by covin between such attorney and demandant, the attorney makes default, by which the land is lost, the tenant who has lost the land shall have a writ of deceit against the attorney. F. N. B. 96. So writ of deceit lies to set aside a fine and recovery in C. B. of lands in ancient demesne. 2 Wils. 17.

In a præcipe quod reddat, if the sheriff return the tenant summoned, where he was not summoned, by which the defendant loseth his land by default at the grand cape returned; the tenant shall have a writ of deceit against him who recovered, and against the sheriff for his false return; and by that writ the tenant shall be restored unto his land again; and the sheriff shall be punished for his falsity. N. B. 97. If a man bring a writ of deceit against him that recovers in the first action, and the sheriff return him summoned, upon which for non-summons in that action on finding the same the recovery is reversed; in this case the defendant shall not have writ of deceit to recover the land again, if he were not summoned; but he shall have his remedy against the sheriff. Rol. Abr. 621. And where debt was brought, and the defendant pleaded in abatement, and the plea was overruled, the attorney on both sides by deceit between them, to the end the plaintiff might recover his debt, entered another judgment, when it should have been a respondeas ouster; and it was held that the writ of deceit would not lie to reverse the record, but only to recover dama-Ibid. 622.

If in a suit or action, another person shall come into court and pretend he is a party to the suit, and so let judgment be had, or some other damage done to the party himself; or if one have cause to have an action, and another brings it in his name, and lets judgment go by nonsuit, or the like, the injured party may have this writ of deceit. There are many frauds and deceits provided against by statute, relating to artificers, bakers, brewers, victuallers, false weights and measures, &c., which are liable to penalties and punishment in proportion to the offences committed. And writ of deceit lies in various cases; for not performing a bargain, or not selling good commodities, &c.

On almost all occasions, where a person is deceived or injured, and where anciently remedy was sought by the writ of deceit, an action on the case for damages, in nature of a writ of deceit, is now more usually brought; and, indeed, it is the only remedy for a lord of a manor, in or out of ancient demesne, to reverse a fine or recovery had in the king's court of lands lying within his jurisdiction, which would otherwise be thereby turned into frank-fee. And this may be brought by the lord against the parties, and cestui que use of such fine and recovery; and thereby he shall obtain judgment not only for damages (which are usually remitted,) but also to recover his court and jurisdiction over the lands, and to annul the former proceedings. 3 Lev. 415. 419 : Lutw. 711. 749.

A count for a deceit, averring that the defendant represented to the plaintiff that his lessor required 150l. premium for a lease, whereas he required only 100l., whereby defendant fraudulently obtained from plaintiff and converted to his own use 50l., is sufficient. Pewtris v. Austin, 6 Taunton, 552.

In case in nature of a deceit to reverse a recovery of lands in an ancient demesne, all the parties to the recovery must be before the court. 2 W. Blackst. 1170.

To support an action against a party for improperly recommending an agent, no more is necessary than to show that the statement was false, and known by the party recommending to be so. It is not necessary to prove a malicious or interested motive. Foster v. Charles, 6 Bing. 396.

The plaintiffs, being about to furnish defendant's son with goods on credit, inquired of defendant by letter if his son had, as he represented, 300l. capital of his own property. Defendant answered he had, when the fact was, that defendant had only lent him 300l. on his promissory note, payable with interest, and he received interest. This was held a deceitful and actionable misrepresentation. Corbett v. Brown, 8 Bingh. 33.

DECIES TANTUM. A writ under stat. 38 Ed. 3. c. 12, which lay against a juror, who had taken money of either party for giving his verdict, to recover ten times as much as the sum taken. See tit. Jury. DECIMATION, decimatio.] The punishing every tenth soldier by lot was termed decimatio legionis; it likewise signifies tithing, or paying a tenth part. There was a decimation during the time of the Usurper, DECINERS, DECENNIERS, or DOZI-NERS, decennarii.] In our ancient law, such as were wont to have the oversight of the friburghs, or views of frank-pledge, for the maintenance of the king's peace; and the limits or compass of their jurisdiction was called decenna, because it commonly consisted of ten households; as every person, bound for himself and his neighbours to keep the peace, was stiled decennier. Bract. lib. 3. tract. 2. c. 15.

These seem to have had large authority in the time of the Saxons, taking knowledge of causes within their circuits, and redressing wrongs by way of judgment, and compelling men thereunto, as appears in the laws of King Edward the Confessor. Lambard, Numb. 32. But of late decennier is not used for the chief man of a dizein, or dozein; but he that is sworn to the king's peace, and by oath of loyalty to the prince, is settled in the society of a dozein.

A dozein seemed to extend so far as a leet extendeth, because in leets the oath of loyalty is administered by the steward, and taken by all such as are twelve years old, and upwards, dwelling within the precinct of the leet where they are sworn. F. N. B. 161. There are now no other dozeins but leets; and there is a great diversity between ancient and modern times, in this point of law and government. 2 Inst. 73. See 1 Comm. 114: 4 Comm. 252: and ante, Decennary.

DECLARATION.

Declaratio, narratio.] A legal specification, on record, of the cause of action, by a plaintiff against a defendant.

The declaration should correspond with the process in the names and descriptions of the parties; for if there be a material variance, the court will set aside the proceedings, unless where the process is taken out against the not to repeat more of the deed than is necesby his right name; there the plaintiff may declare against him by the name in which he appears, stating that he was arrested by the other name; for by appearing the defendant admits himself to be the person sued, and so the variance is immaterial. 3 Term Rep. 611.

The substantial rules of pleading, according to which declarations are to be drawn, are founded in strong sense and the soundest and closest logic, and so appear when well understood and explained, though by being misunderstood and misapplied they are often made use of as instruments of chicane. 1

Rules respecting the form of the declaration. The parties, plaintiff or demandant, defendant or tenant, ought to be well named. The time of a matter charged in the declaration ought to be certainly alleged; and therefore in assumpsit, the day being omitted on which the promise is made, it is bad. Yel. 94: Pl. Com. 24. But the precise day need not be stated, unless it is setting forth an instrument in which, if the day is wrongly stated, it is fatal. A certain place ought to be alleged where every fact material and traversable was done. Kitch. 226. But the place stated may be the common venue. The gist, and every thing that is of the essence of the plaintiff's action, must be set forth in the declaration. That seems properly to be the essence of the action, without which the court could have no sufficient grounds to give judgment. Doct. Pt. 85. If the declaration be not sufficient on which to found a judgment, this may be moved in arrest of judgment after verdict. Ibid. The declaration must show a title in the plaintiff. See Cro. Eliz. 325: Moor, 598. In all cases where an interest or estate commences upon condition, the plaintiff ought to show it in his declaration, and aver the performance of it; but when the interest of the estate passes presently, and vests in the grantee, and is to be defeated by condition; there the plaintiff may count generally, and the condition shall be pleaded by him who is to take advantage of it. 7 Co. 10: Lil. Reg.

The declaration must contain such certain affirmation that it may be traversed; for if there be no certain affirmation to make the declaration itself traversable, it will not be cured after a verdict, because it is a defect in substance. Co. Lit. 30: Cro. Jac. 361: 2 Bulst. 214: Cro. Eliz. 33, 441: 2 Saund. 319. If a declaration be good in part, though bad as to another part, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for so much as is well alleged, especially if it be not of an entire demand. 10 Co. 115: Rol. Abr. 784, 5: 2 Show. 103: 1 Salk. 133. Vide. 3 Burr. 1235.

R. M. 1654. § 13. In a declaration on action founded on a deed, the plaintiff need not set forth more than that part which is necessary to entitle him to recover. Cowp. 665. And it will be sufficient to state the substance and legal effect even of such part; which is shorter, and not liable to mis-recitals and literal mistakes. The distinction is between that which may be rejected as surplusage (which might have been struck out on motion,) and what cannot; where the declaration contains impertinent matter foreign to the cause, and which the master on a reference to him would strike out (irrelevant covenants, for instance,) that will be rejected by the court, and need not be proved. But if the very ground of the action is mis-stated, as where the plaintiff under-takes to recite that part of a deed on which the action is founded, and it is mis-recited, that will be fatal; for then the case declared on is different from that which is proved, and he must recover secundum allegata et probata. Of entitling, and laying the day and place in declaration .- Many niceties formerly occurred as to entitling the declaration generally (which had reference to the first day of term), or specially of some particular day after the cause of action arose; but now, by Rule of Michaelmas Term, 2 and 3 W. 4. every declaration shall be entitled in the proper court, and of the day of the month and year on which it shall be filed or delivered; and any cause of action may in general be given in evidence of the nature specified in the declaration, which occurs before the day of the

If the plaintiff declares on a note, the day is material, and an essential part of the agreement, from which he cannot vary; so on a bond or other writing; but in the case of a common assumpsit, the day is alleged only for form, and therefore the defendant cannot confine the plaintiff to the day alleged in the declaration. Str. 21. Vide Co. Lit. 283: Plowd. Com. 24. a.

In other cases, as in trespass, assault, battery, &c., the day is immaterial, but is in general laid after the cause of action accrued, and before the time of which the declaration is entitled.

In local actions, where possession of land is to be recovered, or damages for an actual trespass, or for waste, &c., affecting land, the plaintiff must lay his declaration, or declare his injury to have happened in the very county and place where it really did happen; but in ceedings are in paper the amendment is at transitory actions, for injuries that might common law, and not within any of the sta-

In a qui-tam action, if the declaration do not on the record appear to be filed within a year of the writ, it is necessary to connect it with the writ by evidence of the time when to be continued on the roll down to that time. In C. P. the placitum being always intituled of the term in or after which the trial takes place, it furnishes no evidence of the date of the declaration. Thistlewood v. Cracruft, 6 Taunton, 141.

In action of debt upon a bond, the plaintiff in his declaration must formerly allege a place where the bond was made, because the jury should come from that place; and if this be omitted, the declaration was ill. Dyer, 15, 39:1 Nels. Abr. 619. But as the jury are no longer required to come from the neighbourhood, the precise place is not matethe county as a venue, or even to state the bond as made in the county generally.

It is good to lay large and sufficient damages in declarations: and damages shall not be given for that which is not contained in the declaration, and only for what is materially alleged. 10 Rep. 115: 1 Lil. Abr. 381.

On filing declarations, copies thereof are served on the defendants or their attorney, &c. And by an order of all the judges (12 W. 3.) the plaintiff's attorney is not obliged to deliver the defendant's attorney the original declaration; but instead of it is to deliver a true copy of the declaration; upon delivery or tender whereof, the defendant's attorney shall pay for such copy after the rate of 4d. per sheet, &c.; and if any person refuse to pay for the copy tendered, the said copy is to be left in the office, with the clerk that keeps the files of declarations, and thereupon the plaintiff's attorney giving rule to plead, may, for want of a plea, sign judgment; and before any plea shall be received, the defendant's attorney is to pay for the copy of the declaration.

If the declaration be filed, and notice thereof given to the defendant or his attorney, it is deemed to be a good declaration from the time of such notice only; and therefore a rule to plead in such case, given before notice of declaration, is irregular; yet, where the declaration in the King's Bench was filed on the last day of the second term after the return of the writ, but the notice was not given till a little before the essoin day of the following term, this was holden to be well enough, the master certifying it to be the practice. The defendant must formerly have received and paid for a copy of the declaration, whether it was delivered or left in the office, before he could have been admitted to plead; and if he neglected to do so, the plaintiff's attorney might have refused to accept his plea, and sign judgment. But now, though a copy of the declaration must be paid for, on taking it out of the office when filed, yet the defendant's attorney, we have seen, is not bound to pay for it when delivered to him.

Most of the recent alterations in pleading applicable to declarations will be found under Several questions and disputes were here. tofore warmly agitated, as to the authority of the master of the rolls to hear and determine causes; and as to his general power in the Court of Chancery: to quict which, it was declared by stat. 3 G. 2.c. 30. that all orders and decrees by him made, except such as by the course of the court were appropriated to the great seal alone, should be deemed to be valid, subject nevertheless to be discharged or allowed by the lord chancellor, and so as they shall not be enrolled till the same are signed by his lordship.

If either party to the suit thinks himself aggrieved by a decree, he may petition the chancellor for a re-hearing, whether it was heard before the chancellor himself, or any of the judges sitting for him, or before the master of the rolls. For in all cases it is the chancellor's decree, and must be signed by him before it is enrolled; which is done of course, unless a re-hearing be desired. Every petition for a re-hearing must be signed by two counsel, usually such as have been concerned in the cause, certifying that they apprehend the cause is proper to be re-heard. And upon the re-hearing, all the evidence taken in the cause, whether read before or not, is then admitted to be read, because it is the decree of the chancellor himself, who only sits to hear reasons why it should not be enrolled and perfected, at which time all omissions of either evidence or argument may be supplied. 504. And see 5 Barn. & A. 682.

2. The deed must be founded upon good and sufficient consideration. Not upon an usurious contract (stat. 13 Eliz. c. 8.); nor upon fraud or collusion, either to deceive purchasers bonâ fide (stat. 27 Eliz. c. 4.); or just and lawful creditors, (stat. 13 Eliz. c. 5.); see 3 B. & Adol. 498; any of which bad considerations will vacate the deed, and subject such persons as put the same in use to forfeitures, and often to imprisonment. A deed also, or other grant, made without any consideration, is, as it were, of no effect; for it is construed to enure, or to be effectual only to the use of the grantor himself. Perk. § 533. The consideration may be either a good or a valuable one. See farther tit. Consideration, and post,

In deeds, the consideration is a principal thing to give them effect; and the foundation of deeds ought always to be honest. That a deed was executed upon a corrupt agreement, dehors the deed, may be averred in pleading. See Collins v. Blantern, 2 Wils. 341. Or on an illegal consideration. Greville v. Atkins, 9 Barn. & C. 462. But a party cannot allege his own fraud to avoid a deed. 2 Barn. & A. 367.

3. The deed must be written or (as is the case at present with many instruments, such as bonds, policies of insurance,, &c.) printed, guage, but it must be upon paper or parch-There are many descriptions of grantors ment; for if it be written on stone, board,

> All the matter and form of a deed must be written before the sealing and delivery of it: for if a man seals and delivers an empty piece of parchment or paper, although he therewithal gives commandment that an obligation or other matter shall be written in it, which is done accordingly, yet this will not make it a good deed. Co. Lit. 171: Perk. § 118, 119. See Moor, 28: Hetley, 136, 137.

A deed may be written in any hand, as in text, court, or Roman hand; or in any language, as in Latin or French, and is as good as a deed written in English, and in a secretary hand. 2 Co. 3. It has been decided that a promissory note may be indersed in pencil; 5 Barn. & C. 234; and it would seem a deed might be so written.

It may be written either in a piece of loose paper or parchment, or in a paper or parchment sewed in a book. Bro. Oblig. 67: Co. Lit. 137. 139.

A deed must also have the regular stamps imposed on it by the several statutes, for the increase of the public revenue; else it cannot be given in evidence. See post, 7.

Formerly many conveyances were made by parol, or word of mouth only, without writing; but this giving a handle to a variety of frauds, the stat. 29 Car. 2 c. 3. enacts that no lease, estate, or interest, in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, made by livery of seisin, or by parol only (except leases not exceeding three years from the making, and whereupon the reserved rent is at least twothirds of the real value) shall be looked upon as of greater force than a lease or estate at will; nor shall any assignment, grant, or surrender of any interest in any freehold hereditaments be valid, unless in both cases the same be put in writing, and signed by the party granting, or his agent, lawfully authorised in writing. See tit. Frauds.

4. The matter written must be legally and orderly set forth; that is, there must be words sufficient to specify the agreement, and bind the parties; which sufficiency must be left to the courts of law to determine. Co. Lit. 225. For it is not absolutely necessary in law, to have all the formal parts that are usually drawn out in deeds, so as there be sufficient words to declare clearly and legally the party's meaning. But, as these formal and orderly parts are calculated to convey that meaning in the clearest, distinctest, and most effectual manner, and have been well considered and settled by the wisdom of successive ages, it is prudent not to depart from them without good reason or urgent necessity; therefore they shall be recapitulated in their usual order. See 1 Inst. 6.

It may in the first place be generally observed with regard to the words requisite in a | premises, " to him and his heirs," habendum deed, that they depend upon the estate intended to be conveyed. If a man would purchase lands or tenements in fee-simple, it behoves him to have these words in his purchase, To have and to hold to him and to his heirs; for these words, his heirs (only), make the estate of inheritance, in all feoffments and grants. But this is to be understood of natural bodies: for it lands be given to a sole body politic or corporate (as to a bishop, parson, vicar, master of an hospital, &c.) there, to give him an estate of inheritance in his politic or corporate capacity, he must use these words, To have and to hold to him and his successors. Co. Lit. 8. 800

If an estate tail is intended to be created, the words must be, To have and to hold to him and to the heirs of his body. See tit. Fee.

The insertion of the word heirs or successors, as the case requires, is therefore absolutely necessary in conveyances of estates of inheritance; for if a man purchase lands by these words, To have and to hold to him for ever, he has but an estate for term of life. See Co. Lit. 8. b. &c.

A deed or conveyance cannot operate as an exchange without the word " exchange." Eton Coll. v. Wickliffe, Bp. 3 Wils. 458. 485.

The words "equally to be divided," in a deed of uses, make a tenancy in common. 1 Wils.

A deed of release, containing the words "all lands, &c. used, occupied, and enjoyed, or deemed, taken, or accepted, as part thereof," will pass leasehold lands, which answer that description as well as freehold, especially against the releasor. 1 H. Black. 25.

We may now proceed more particularly to observe on the formal and orderly parts of a

The premises are used to set forth the number and names of the parties, with their additions or titles. They also contain the recital, if any, of such deeds, agreements, or matters of fact, as are necessary to explain the reasons upon which the present transaction is founded; and herein also is set down the consideration upon which the deed is made. And then follows the certainty of the grantor, grantee, and thing granted. See tit. Premises.

Next come the Habendum and Tenendum. The office of the habendum is properly to determine what estate or interest is granted by the deed, though this may be performed, and sometimes is performed, in the premises; in which case the habendum may lessen, enlarge, explain, or qualify, but not totally contradict, or be repugnant to the estate granted in the premises. As if a grant be "to A. and the heirs of his body" in the premises, habendum "to him and his heirs for ever," or vice versa, the value of what should be evicted. See here A. has an estate tail, and a fee-simple ex- farther, title Warranty. pectant thereon. Co. Lit. 21: 2 Roll. Rep. 19. 23: Cro. Jac. 476. But, had it been in the or conventions; which are clauses of agree-

"to him for life," the habendum would be utterly void; 2 Rep. 23: 8 Rep. 56; for an estate of inheritance is vested in him before the habendum comes, and shall not afterwards be taken away, or devested, by it. See tit. Habendum. The tenendum, " and to hold," is now of very little use, and is only kept in by custom. It was sometimes formerly used to signify the tenure by which the estate granted was to be holden, viz. " tenendum per servitium militare, in burgagio, in libero socagio," But, all these things being now reduced to free and common socage, the tenure is never specified. Before the stat. of quia emptores, 18 Ed. 1st. 1. it was also sometimes used to denote the lord of whom the land should be holden; but that statute directing all future purchasers to hold not of the immediate grantor, but of the chief lord of the fee. this use of the tenendum hath been also antiquated; though for a long time after we find it mentioned in ancient charters, that the tenements shall be holden, de capitalibus dominis feodi, but as this expressed nothing more than the statute had already provided for, it gradually grew out of use. Tenure.

Next follow the terms of stipulation, if any, upon which the grant is made: the first of which is the reddendum, or reservation, whereby the grantor doth create or reserve some new thing to himself out of what he had before granted. As " rendering therefore yearly the sum of ten shillings, or a peppercorn, or two days ploughing, or the like." Under the pure feodal system, this render, reditus, return, or rent, consisted in chivalry, principally of military services; in villenage, of the most slavish offices; and in socage it usually consists of money, though it may still consist of services, or of any other certain profit. To make a reddendum good, if it be of any thing newly created by the deed, the reservation must be to the grantors, or some. or one of them, and not to any stranger to the deed. Plowd. 13: 8 Rep. 71. But if it be of ancient services, or the like, annexed to the land, then the reservation may be to the lord of the fee. See Reddendum.

Another of the terms upon which a grant may be made is a Condition; as to which sec fully title Condition.

Next may follow the clause of warranty. This was anciently inserted in deeds to secure the estate to the grantee and his heirs, &c., and was a covenant real, annexed to the land granted, by which the grantor and his heirs were bound to warrant the same to the grantee and his heirs, and that they should quietly hold and enjoy it; or upon voucher, &c. the grantor should yield other lands to

Thus the grantor unable to write their names. In like manner, may covenant that he hath a right to convey; the Normans, at their first settlement in or for the grantee's quiet enjoyment; or the France, used the practice of sealing only, like; the grantee may covenant to pay his without writing their names: which custom rent, or keep the premises in repair, &c. If continued when learning made its way among the covenantor covenants for himself and his them, though the reason for doing it had heirs, it is then a covenant real, and descends ceased; and hence the charter of Edward the upon the heirs, who are bound to perform it, Confessor to Westminster Abbey, himself provided they have assets by descent, but not being brought up in Normandy, was witotherwise; if he covenants also for his execu- nessed only by his seal, and is generally tors and administrators, his personal assets, as thought to be the oldest sealed charter of any well as his real, are likewise pledged for the authenticity in England. Lamb. Archeion, performance of the covenant; which makes 51. such covenant a better security than any war-ranty. It is also in some respects a less security, and therefore more beneficial to the grantor; who usually covenants only for the acts of himself, and his ancestors, whereas a general warranty extended to all mankind. For which reasons the covenant has in modern practice totally superseded the other. See fully this Dict. tits. Assets, Covenant, Assignment, Heir.

Lastly, comes the Conclusion, which mentions the execution and date of the deed, or the time of its being given or executed, either expressly, or by reference to some day or year before-mentioned. Not but a deed is good, although it mention no date; or hath a false date, or even if it hath an impossible date, as the 30th of February, provided the real day of its being dated or given, that is, delivered, can be proved. Co. Lit. 46: Dyer, 28.-See farther, title Date.

When there is a sensible date to a deed, the word date means the day of the date and not of the delivery; but if there be no date, or an insensible one, the word date may be construed delivery. 4 B. & C. 908.

5. A fifth requisite for making a good deed is the reading of it. This is necessary wherever any of the parties desire it, and if it be not done on his request, the deed is void as to him. If he can, he should read it himself; if he be blind or illiterate, another must read it to him. If it be read falsely, it will be void; at least for so much as is misrecited; unless it be agreed by collusion, that the deed shall be read false, on purpose to make it void; for in such case it shall bind the fraudulent party. 2 Rep. 3. 9: 11 Rep. 27.

6. It is requisite that the party or parties whose deed it is, should seal, and now in most cases should sign it also. The use of seals, as a mark of authenticity to letters and other instruments in writing, is extremely ancient, thenticate a deed; and hence the common We read of it among the Jews and Persians form of attesting deeds, "sealed and deliverin the earliest and most sacred records of his ed," notwithstanding the stat. 29 Car. 2. c. 3. tory. But in the times of our Saxon ances-before mentioned, revives the Saxon custom, tors, they were not much in use in England. and expressly directs the signing, in all grants The method of the Saxons was for such as of lands, and many other species of deeds: in could write to subscribe their names, and, which therefore signing seems to be now as whether they could write or not, to affix the necessary as scaling, though it hath been

51. At the conquest, the Norman lords brought over into this kingdom their own fashions; and introduced waxen seals only, instead of the English methods of writing their names, and signing with the sign of the cross. Ingulph. And in the reign of Edward I. every freeman, and even such of the more substantial villeins as were fit to be put upon juries, had their distinct particular seals. Stat. Exon. 14 Ed. 1. Coats of arms were not introduced into seals, nor indeed into any other use, till about the reign of Richard I., who brought them from the Croisade in the Holy Land.

The signing is of great use, for the subscribing witnesses to the deed may be dead; when proving their death, and the handwriting of the party executing the deed, will be sufficient to establish the same. If a writing is not sealed, it cannot be a deed. 3 Inst. 169: 5 Rep. 23. See farther, 2 Rep. 3: 2 Rol. Abr. 28: 12 Rep. 90: Hob. 96.

An award, though under seal, is not a deed, unless the arbitrator delivers it as such, and therefore if only delivered as an award it does not require a deed stamp. 4 East, 584.

If two make a deed, and one of them seals it at one time, and the other at another time; this is as good as if they sealed it together.

If A. executes a deed for himself and his partner, by the authority of his partner, and in his presence, it is a good execution though only sealed once. 1 Term. Rep. 313.

A person executing a deed for his princi-pal under a power of attorney, should sign in the name of the principal. 6 Term Rep. 176. See 2 East Rep. 142. Ry. & Moo.

The neglect of signing, and resting only upon the authenticity of seals, remained very long among us; for it was held in all our books that sealing alone was sufficient to authenticate a deed: and hence the common sometimes held that the one includes the other. | as a deed may be delivered by words without 3 Lev. 1: Stra. 764.

By stat. 54 G. 3. c. 168. to amend the laws respecting the attestation of instruments of appointment and revocation made in exercise of certain powers in deeds or wills, after reciting that powers, authorities, and trusts are in many cases required to be executed by deeds signed by or under the hands of the persons executing or consenting thereto, and it has been the ordinary practice in the memorandum of attestation of deeds to express the facts of sealing and delivering only, and that the omission of the word signed in such attestation might affect titles under such deeds, although actually signed by the parties; it is enacted, that any deed or instrument then already made with intent to execute any power, &c., shall if duly signed, &c. be from the date thereof of the like validity as if a memorandum of signature had been subjoined by the attesting witnesses.

Since the passing of this act the practice has been, in cases not only of deeds for execution of powers, but generally of other deeds, to assert in the memorandum of the attestation the words "signed, sealed, and delivered," and this is the safest and properest way.

7. A seventh requisite to a good deed is, that it be delivered by the party himself or his certain attorney: which therefore is also expressed in the attestation, "sealed and delivered." A deed takes effect only from this tradition or delivery; for if the date be false or impossible, the delivery ascertains the time. of it. See Styles v. Wardle, 4 Barn. & Cres. And if another person seals the deed, yet if the party delivers it himself, he thereby adopts the sealing; Perk. § 130; and by a parity of reason the signing also, and makes them both his own. A delivery may be either absolute, that is, to the party or grantee himself; or to a third person, to hold till some condition be performed on the part of the grantee; in which last case it is not delivered as a deed, but as an escrow: that is, as a scrowl or writing, which is not to take effect as a deed, till the condition be performed, and then it is a deed to all intents and purposes. Co. Lit.

If I have sealed my deed, and after I deliver it to him to whom it is made, or to some other by his appointment, and say nothing, this is a good delivery.

So if I take the deed in my hand, and use these, or the like words, here take him; or, this will serve; or, I deliver this as my deed; or, I deliver him you; these are deliveries.

So if I make a deed of land to another, and being upon the land, I deliver the deed to him in the name of seisin of the land; this is a good delivery.

So if the deed be sealed, or lying in a window, or on a table, and I use these, or the like is a good delivery, and perfects the deed; for, out saying any thing at the time of its execuacts, so may it also be delivered by acts without words. 9 Co. 137: Dyer, 167. 192: Co. Lit. 36. 49: 35 Ass. pl. 6. Contra, if the party to whom made takes it without any act done purporting to be a delivery. But where parties have come for the purpose, and done every thing but delivery, it has been adjudged a good delivery. Cro. Eliz. 7: 1 Leon. 140.

Regularly there may not be two deliveries of a deed; for where the first doth take effect, the second is void; unless it be where the deed is delivered to a stranger as an escrow; or, when a deed, good at first, becomes void afterwards; or, a feme covert seals a deed, and after being sole, delivers it again, &c. Perk. sect. 154: Co. Lit. 48: 5 Rep. 119.

The stat. 26 G. 3. c. 60. § 17. avoids a bill of sale of a registered ship, which does not truly and accurately recite the certificate of registry. Where parties by mistake misrecited in a bill of sale the certificate of registry, by stating Guernsey as the port which the certificate was granted instead of Weymouth, which mistake was rectified when discovered, by the consent of all parties, and the deed dedelivered de novo, the Court of K. B. held that no new stamp was necessary on such re-delivery or re-execution: the deed taking no effect from its first delivery, and the defect arising not from intention but from mistake, and the alteration merely making the contract what it was originally intended to have been. v. Parkin, 12 East's Rep. 471. See 6 G. 4. c. 110. the present Registry Act.

The delivery of a deed may be alleged at any rate after the date; but not before. Dyer, See Styles v. Wardle, 4 Barn. & Cres. A deed may be good without all the orderly and formal parts: but without delivery it is no deed. 1 Inst. 35 1 2 Rep. 5.

Where a party to an instrument seals it and declares in the presence of a witness that he "delivers it as his deed," but keeps it in his own possession (and there is nothing to qualify that, or to show that the executing party did not intend it to operate immediately, except his keeping the deed in his hands,) it is a valid and effectual deed: and delivering to the party who is to take by the deed, or to any person for his use, is not essential. Delivery to a third person for the use of the party in whose favour the deed is executed, where the grantor parts with all control over the deed. renders the deed effectual from the time of such delivery, although the person to whom the deed is so delivered be not the agent of the party for whose benefit the deed is made. Doe, d. Garnons v. Knight, 5 B. & C. 671.

Previous to the execution of a deed of composition for debts to creditors, it was agreed in the presence of the surety for the payment of such composition, that it should be void unless all the creditors executed: the sureties then words, There he is, take it as my deed: this executed the deed in the usual manner withtors in order that he might get it executed by the rest; held that this was a delivery of the deed as an escrow; and as all the creditors had not executed, the surety was not bound thereby, Johnson v. Baker, 4 B. & A. 440.

Deed of trust for the benefit of creditors was declared valid where it was proved that when executed a blank was left for a sum due, which was filled up next day in presence of the party: on the ground that if the execution of the deed in the imperfect state were nugatory, the presumption was justified that it was delivered when the blank was filled; or that it was originally delivered to have operation from the time when it should be filled. Hudson v. Revett, 5 Bingh. 268. (See Bull.

N. P. 267. contra.

8. The last requisite to the validity of the deed is, the attestation, or execution of it in the presence of witnesses: this however, is necessary, rather for preserving the evidence than for constituting the essence of the deed. And as to such attestation so far as relates to eigning and sealing, see ante, II. 6. Our modern deeds are in reality nothing more than improvement or amplification of the brevia testata mentioned by the feodal writers (Feud. l. 1. t. 4.); which were written memorandums, introduced to perpetuate the tenor of the conveyance and investiture, when grants by parol only became the foundation of frequent dispute and uncertainty. To this end they registered in the deed the persons who attended as witnesses, which was formerly done without their signing their names (that not being always in their power), but they only heard the deed read; and then the clerk or scribe added their names, in a sort of memorandum, " hiis testibus," &c. This, like all other solemn transactions, was originally done only coram paribus, (Feud. t. 2. t. 32.), and frequently when assembled in the court-baron, hundred, or county-court, which was then expressed in the attestation, teste comitatu, hundredo, &c. Spelm. Gloss. 228: Madox Formul. N. 221. 322. 660. Afterwards the attestation of other witnesses was allowed, the trial in case of a dispute being still reserved to the pares; with whom the witnesses (if more than one) were associated and joined in the verdict; (Co. Lit. 6.) till that also was abrogated by the stat. of York, 12 Ed. 2. st. 1. c. 2. And in this manner, with some such clause of hiis testibus, and to give the witnesses notice of it (this is are all old deeds and charters, particularly Magna Charta, witnessed. And in the time of Sir Edward Coke, creations of nobility were still witnessed in the same manner. 2 it be in any place material, as in the name of Inst. 77. > III. How a Deed may be avoided.-From what has been before laid down, it will follow that if a deed wants any of the essential requisites before-mentioned; either, 1. Proper parties, and a proper subject matter.-2. A good and sufficient consideration .- 3. Writing on paper, or parchment, duly stamped.—4. Sufficient and legal words, properly disposed. -5. Reading if desired before the execution. -6. Sealing; and, by the statute in most cases signing also;—or 7. Delivery, it is a void deed ab. initio. It may also be avoided by matter ex post facto, as 1. By rasure, interlining, or other alteration in any material part; unless a memorandum be made thereof at the time of execution and attestation. 11. Rep. 27: 4 B. & A. 674 .- 2. By breaking off, or defacing the seal. 5 Rep. 23: 1 Barn. & Cres. 682.—3. By delivering it up to be cancelled; that is, to have lines drawn over it in the form of a lattice work or cancelli; though the phrase is now used figuratively for any manner of obliteration or defacing it.- 4. By the disagreement of such, whose concurrence is necessary, in order for the deed to stand; as a husband where a feme covert is concerned; an infant, or person under duress, when those disabilities are removed; and the like. -5. By the judgment or decree of a court of judicature. This was anciently the province of the court of Star-chamber, and now of the Chancery: when it appears that the deed was obtained by fraud, force, or other foul practice: or is proved to be an absolute forgery. Toth. 24: 1 Ventr. 348. In any of these cases the deed may be avoided, either in part or totally, according as the cause of avoidance is more or less extensive.

> More particularly.-If there be any alteration, rasure, or interlining made in any part of the deed before the delivery of it, this will not hurt the deed.

But in such cases it is policy to make a memorandum of it upon the back of the deed, now usually done in the attestation of the deed thus: Sealed and delivered, the wordbeing first interlined, &c.) For otherwise, if any material part, after the delivery, it makes I ficient as the original deed, by stat. 10 Anne, the estate void: but if the estate may have essence without a deed, then, notwithstanding it is created by deed, and that deed is rased, it shall not destroy the estate, but the deed. 1 Nels. Abr. 625.

When a chose in action is created by deed, the destruction of such deed is the destruction of the duty itself; as in case of a bond, bill, &c., though it is not so, where an estate or interest is created by a deed. 3 Salk. 120.

If a deed be suppressed, on proof made that it came to the party's hands, and of its contents, the person injured will have the same benefit to hold the estate, as if the deed could be produced. 2 Vern. 280. shall enter into any forest, chase, or purlieu, | whether inclosed or not, or into any inclosed land where deer shall be usually kept, with intent unlawfully to hunt, course, or carry away any deer, it shall be lawful for any person entrusted with the care of such deer, and for any of his assistants, whether in his presence or not, to demand from every such offender any gun or engine in his possession, and any dog there brought; and in case such offender shall not immediately deliver up the same, to seize and take the same from him, in any of those respective places, or upon pursuit made in any other place to which he may have escaped therefrom, for the use of the owner of the deer.

By the same section, if any such offender shall unlawfully beat or wound any person entrusted with the care of the deer, or any of his assistants, in the execution of any of the powers given by this act, he shall be guilty of felony, and shall be liable to be punished as in the case of simple larceny. This and the preceding are substantially a re-enactment of the 9th section of the stat. 16 G. 3. c. 30. However, that stat. empowered the keepers to seize the guns, &c. but did not in terms make previous demand necessary, and it was objected (Rex v. This enactment is a substitution for the 4th, 5th, and 6th sections of the 16 G. 3. c. 30. which stat. is wholly repealed. DEFAULT OF JURORS. See tit. Jury.

DEFEASANCE, from the Fr. defaire, to defeat or undo.] Is of two sorts:- I. A collateral deed made at the same time with a feoffment or other conveyance, containing certam conditions, upon the performance of which the estate then created may be defeated or to-In this manner mortgages tally undone. were in former times usually made; the mortgagor enfeoffing the mortgagee, and he at the same time executing a deed of defeasance, whereby the feoffment was rendered void on repayment of the money borrowed at a certain day. And this, when executed at the same time with the original feoffment, was considered as a part of it by the ancient law, and therefore only indulged; no subsequent secret revocation of a solemn conveyance, executed by livery of seisin, being allowed in those days of simplicity and truth; though when uses were afterwards introduced, a revocation of such uses was permitted by courts of equity. But things that were merely executory, or to be completed by matter subsequent (as rents of which no seisin could be had till time of payment, annuities, conditions, warranties, and the like), were always liable to be recalled by defeasances made subsequent to the time of their creation. 2. A defeasance on a bond, recognisance, or judgment recovered, or warrant of attorney, is a condition which, when performed, defeats that in the same manner as the foregoing defeasance of an estate. It differs only from the common condition of a bond in that the one is always inserted in the deed or bond itself, the other is made between the same parties generally by a separate, and frequently by a subsequent, deed. The defeasance to a warrant of attorney is indorsed on it. This, like the condition of a bond when performed, discharges and disincumbers the estate of the obligor. 2

To make a good defeasance it must be, 1. By deed (in the case of indorsement by a deedpoll); for there cannot be a defeasance of a deed without deed; and a writing under hand doth not imply it to be a deed. 2. It must recite the deed it relates to, or at least the most tween the same persons that were parties to

For a general defence or denial was granted. And it is the same of obligations, not prudent in every situation, since thereby recognisances, statutes, judgments, &c. which the propriety of the writ, the competency of are most commonly the subject of defeasance, the plaintiff, and the cognisance of the court, and usually made after the deed whereto they were allowed. species of injury by ouster or privation of the freehold, where the entry of the present tenant or possessor was originally lawful, but his detainer is now become unlawful. 3 Comm. 172.

For that at first the withholding was with force and violence, it was called a deforcement of the lands or tenements: but now it is generally extended to all kind of wrongful withholding of lands or tenements from the right owner .- There is a writ called a quod ei deforciat, which lieth where tenant in tail, or tenant for life, loseth by default; by the stat. DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, fidei de- nomen generalissimum, signifying the holding he that hath right to the freehold is kept out perty, but never had any possession under that right, as falls not within any of those terms. As in case where a lord has a seignory, and lands escheat to him propter defectum sanguinis, but the seisin of the lands is with-held from him; here the injury is not abatement, for the right vests not in the lord as heir in him who hath the remainder or reversion; nor is it disseisin, for the lord was never seised; nor does it at all bear the nature of any species of discontinuance; but being neither of these four, it is therefore a deforcement. F. N. B. 143. If a man marries a woman, and during the coverture is seised of lands, and aliens, and dies; is disseised, and dies; or dies in possession: and the alienee, disseisor, or heir, enters on the tenements, and doth not assign the widow her dower; this is also a deforcement to the widow, by withholding lands to which she hath a right. F. N. B. 147. In like manner, if a man lease lands to another for term of years, or for the life of a third person, and the term expires by surrender, efflux of time or death of the cestuy que vie; and the lessee or any stranger, who was at the expiration of the term in possession, holds over, and refuses to deliver the possession to him in remainder, or reversion, this is likewise a deforcement. Finch, L. 263: F. N. B. 201. 5, 6, 7.

Deforcements may also arise upon the breach of condition in law; as if a woman gives lands to a man by deed, to the intent that he marry her, and he will not when thereunto required, but continues to hold the lands: this is such a fraud on the man's part, DEFORCEMENT, deforciamentum.] A that the law will not allow it to divest the woman's right of possession, though his entry being lawful, it does devest the actual possession, and thereby becomes a deforcement. F. N. B. 205.

Deforcements may also be grounded on the disability of the party deforced: as if an infant do make an alienation of his lands, and the alienee enters and keeps possession; now, as the alienation is voidable, this possession is against the infant (or, in case of his decease, as against his heir) is after avoidance wrongful, and therefore a deforcement. Finch, L. 264: F. N. B. 219. The same happens, when one of non-sane memory aliens his lands or tenements, and the alience enters and takes possession, this may also be a deforcement. Finch, L. 264: F. N. B. 202.

Another species of deforcement is, where Deforcement in its most extensive sense is two persons have the same title to land, and one of them enters and keeps possession | degrading by act of parliament; for by stat. against the other, as where the ancestor dies seised of an estate in fee-simple, which descends to two sisters as co-parceners, and one of them enters before the other, and will not suffer her sister to enter and enjoy her moiety; this is also a Deforcement. Finch, L. 293, 4: F. N. B. 197.

Deforcement may also be grounded on the non-performance of a covenant real; as if a man seised of lands, covenants to convey them to another, and neglects or refuses so to do, but continues possession against him; this possession being wrongful, is a deforcement. F. N. B. 146. In levying a fine of lands, the person, against whom the fictitious action is brought, upon a supposed breach of covenant, is called deforciant. And, lastly, by way of analogy, keeping a man by any means out of a freehold office is construed to be a deforcement; though, being an incorporeal hereditament, the deforciant has no corporcal possession. So that whatever injurious withholding the possession of a freehold is not included under abatement, intrusion, disseisin, or discontinuance (see those tits.), is comprised under Deforcement. 3 Comm. 172. 4. DEGRADATION, degradatio.] An ecclesiastical censure, whereby a clergyman is divested of his holy orders. There are two sorts of degrading by the canon law; one summary, by word only; the other solemn, by stripping the party degraded of those ornaments and rights which are the ensigns of his order or degree. Selden's Titles of Hon. 787.

Degradation is otherwise called deposition; and in former times the degrading of a clerk was no more than a displacing or suspension from his office: but the canonists have since distinguished between a deposition and a degradation; the one being now used as a greater punishment than the other, because the bishop takes from the criminal all the badges of his order, and afterwards delivers him to the secular judge, where he cannot purge himself of the offence whereof he is convicted, &c.

There is likewise a degradation of a lord or a knight, &c. at common law; when they are attainted of treason; as in Hil. 18 Ed. 2. Andrew Harcla, Earl of Carlisle, who was also a knight, was degraded, and when judgment of treason was pronounced against him, his sword was broken over his head, and his

DEL CREDERE. In a confined sense a commission del credere is an undertaking by an insurance broker, for an additional premium, to insure his principal against the contingency of the failure of the under-writer. See Grove & al' v. Dubois, 1 Term. Rep. 112: Bize v. Dickason, Id. 285: Morris v. Cleasby, 4 M. & S. 566.

In a more enlarged sense the nature of a commission del credere, appears from the case of Mackenzie & al' v. Scott, Brown's Parl. Cases, 8 vo. vi. 280. to be as follows:-

Del credere is an Italian mercantile phrase signifying the same as the English term guarantee, or warranty, or the Scotch term warrandice: and when applied to the situation of a factor, is understood in the following sense. A factor who has general orders to dispose of goods for his constituent to the best advantage, is, like all factors, liable only to that degree of diligence which a prudent man uses in his own affairs; and consequently a factor is authorised to dispose of the goods according to the best terms which can be attained; and spurs hewn off his heels, &c. And there is a if it shall appear that he has done so, and that he has sold his goods to persons in reputed | deed, the other in law: in deed as in a pragood circumstances at the time, and to whom cipe quod reddat there is an express demand. he would have given credit in his own affairs, Every entry on land, distress for rent, taking he will not be liable to his constituent although of goods, &c., which may be done without some of these persons should fail; and for such trouble, the factor is generally paid by a per centage upon the goods sold, and in this case the constituent runs the risk of the credit of the person to whom the goods are so sold. Many merchants do not choose to run this risk, and to trust to the prudence and discretion of the factor; and therefore the agreement called del credere was invented, by which the factor, for an additional premium when he sells goods on credit, becomes bound to war-land and rent, so the bringing an action of rant the solvency of the purchasers; and renders himself liable in all events for the pay-mand in law of the debt. 1 Lill. 432: 1 Nels. ment of the price of the goods sold. It is also said there are three sorts of demands; one in writing without speaking, and that is in every pracipe; one without writing, being a verbal demand of the person, who is to do or perform the thing; and another made without either word or writing, which is a demand in law, in cases of entries on lands, &c. A demand is to be legal, and made in such manner as the law requires: if it be for rent of a messuage and lands, it ought to be made at the messuage, at the fore dore of the house, the most notorious place: where lands and woods are let together, the rent is to be demanded on the land as the most worthy thing, and on the most public part thereof; if wood only be leased, the demand must be made at the gate of the wood, &c. 1 Inst. 201: Poph. Vide Dyer, 51: 1 Leon. 425: Cro. Eliz.

If there is a house, at the fore door; though it is not mano. 4. If the appointment is at any other still reputed to be, in a manner, in the lord's place.—5. The time of the demand is to be certain, that the tenant may be there, if he will, to pay the rent: and the last time of demand of the rent, must be such a convenient time before the sun-setting of the last day of payment, as the money may be numbered. The lessor or his sufficient attorney is to remain upon the land, the last day on which the rent due ought to be paid, until it be so dark that he cannot see to tell the money: and if the money thus demanded is not paid, this is a denial in law, though there are no words of denial; upon which a re-entry may be made, &c. 1 Inst. 201, 202: 4 Rep. 73. See farther tit. Entry. As to demand of lands, see tit. Fine; and as to a demand and refusal of goods, being evidence of a conversion, see tit. Trover.

As a release of suits is more large than of quarrels or actions; so a release of demands is more large and beneficial than either of them. DEMEASE. Death. Scotch Dict. See Demise.

DEMEINE, DEMAIN, DEMESNE, Fr. -Lat dominicum, domanium; also written domaine, and signifieth patrimonium domini.] Demains according to common speech are the lord's chief manor-place, with the lands thereto belonging; terræ dominicales, which he and his ancestors have from time to time kept in their own manual occupation, for the maintenance of themselves and their families: and all the parts of a manor, except what is in the hands of free holders, are said to be demains. Copyhold lands have been accounted demains, because they that are the tenants hereof are judged in law to have no other esterial whether any person be in the house or tate but at the will of the lord; so that it is place off the land, the demand must be at that hands: but this word is oftentimes used for a distinction between those lands that the lord of the manor hath in his own hands, or in the hands of his lessee demised as a rack-rent, and such other land appertaining to the manor, which belongeth to free or copyholders. Bract. lib. 4. tract. 3. c. 9: Fleta, lib. 5. cap. 5. As demains are lands in the lord's hands manually occupied, some have thought this word derived from de manu; but it is from the Fr. demaine, which is used for an inheritance, and that comes from dominium, because a man has a more absolute dominion over that which he keeps in his hands, than of that which he lets to his tenants. Blount.

Domanium properly signifies the king's lands in France, appertaining to him in property: and in like manner do we in some sort use it here in England; for all lands, it is said, are either mediately or immediately held of the crown; and when a man in pleading would signify his land to be his own he saith, that he is seised thereof in his domain (or rather demesne) as of fee; whereby is meant, that although his land be to him and his heirs, it depends upon a superior lord, and is held by rent or service, &c. Lit. lib. 1. cap. 1. From this it hath been observed, that lands in the hands of a common person cannot be true demesnes: and certain it is, that lands in the possession of a subject are called demains in a different sense from the demain lands of the crown. For demains, or domains, in the hands of a subject, have their derivation d domo, because they are lands in his possession for the maintaining of his house: but the domains of the crown are held of the king, who is absolute lord having proper dominion; and not by any feudal tenure of a superior lord, as of fee. DEMISE, demissio.] Is applied to an estate either in fee, for term of life, or years, but most commonly the latter: it is used in writs for any estate. 2 Inst. 483. The word demisi, in a lease for years, implies a warranty to the lessee and his assignee; and upon this wordaction of covenant lies against the heir of the lessor, if he ousts the lessee; it binds the executors of the lessor, who has fee-simple, or fee-tail, where any lessee is evicted, and the executor hath assets. DEMURRAGE. An allowance made to the master of a ship by his freightors, for staying longer in a place than the time first appointed for his departure. The amount is generally inserted in the charter-party to be paid daily as it becomes due; the days are always limited; so that on the expiration thereof, and protests duly made, the master is at liberty to proceed. See Abbot on Shipping, p. 182. (5th ed.)

The word "Days" used alone in a clause of demurrage for unlading in the river Thames, is to be understood of working or running days only, and not to comprehend Sundays or holidays, by the usage among merchants in London. Cochran v. Retbergh, DEMURRER. From the lat. demorare, Fr. demeurer.] A pause or stop put to any action upon a point of difficulty, which must be determined by the court, before any farther proceedings can be had therein: for in every action the point of controversy consists either in fact or in law; if in fact, that is tried by the jury; but if in law, that is determined by the court.

A demurrer, therefore, is an issue upon matter of law. It confesses the facts to be true, as stated by the opposite party; but denies that by the law arising upon those facts, any injury is done to the plaintiff, or that the defendant has made out a lawful excuse, according to the party which first demurs, (demoratur, moratur in lege,) that is, rests or abides in law upon the point in question. As, if the matter of the declaration be insufficient in law (as by not assigning any sufficient trespass, &c.), then the defendant demurs to the declaration. If on the other hand the defendant's excuse or plea be invalid (as if he pleads that he committed the trespass by authority from a stranger, without making out the stranger's right), here the plaintiff may demur to the plea: and so in every other part of the proceedings.

The form of such demurrer is by averring the declaration or plea, the replication or rejoinder, to be insufficient in law to maintain the action or the defence; and therefore praying judgment for want of sufficient matter alleged. Sometimes demurrers are merely for want of sufficient form in the writ or declaration. But in case of exception to the form or manner of pleading, the party demurring must by stats. 27 Eliz. c. 5; 4 and 5 Anne, c. 16. set forth the causes of his demurrer. See tits. Amendment, Pleading. And upon either a general or such special demurrer, the opposite party must aver it to be sufficient, which is 40: 1 Inst. 71.

A demurrer is admitting the matter of fact, otherwise the court has no foundation on which to make any judgment. Gilb. Hist. of C. P. 55.

If there be a general demurrer to the declaration, the plaintiff may apply to a judge for a summons for leave to amend; if not, he may proceed to join in demurrer, and make up the demurrer-book himself, a copy of which he is to deliver to defendant's attorney, and if not paid for on demand, sign judgment. R. Tr. 12 W. 3. (now allowed in costs and need not be paid for on delivery.) Rep. 287. in note (a.)

The demurrant argues first, and the court will hear but two counsel, viz. one of a side: and, if desired on either side (unless the case be very plain), the court will hear farther arguments the next term. Demurrers are now frequently put in for delay. In such cases, the party wishing to avoid the delay makes up four demurrer-books and delivers to the judges two days before the day when judgment is moved for; which is given of course without argument. When the court gives judgment on demurrer in debt for the plaintiff in the action, the judgment is for the plaintiff to recover his debt, costs, and damages; but if it be in action on the case, a writ of inquiry of damages must be awarded, before the plaintiff can have final judgment; or if the action be on bill of exchange, or promissory note, the plaintiff may obtain a rule to refer the same to the master to assess the damages, compute interest, &c., and after costs are taxed, final judgment is entered, &c., and execution may be sued out. It is, however, subject to the following exceptions:-First, if the plaintiff demur to a plea in abatement, and the court decide against the plea, they will give judgment of respondeat ouster, without regard to any defect in the declaration. Secondly, the court will not look back into the record, to adjudge in favour of any apparent right in the plaintiff, unless the plaintiff have himself put his action upon that ground; thus, where, on a covenant to perform an award, and not to prevent the arbitrators from making an award, the plaintiff declared in covenant, and assigned as a breach, that the defendant would not pay the sum awarded; and the defendant pleaded that before the award made, he revoked, by deed, the authority of the arbitrators, to which the plaintiff demurred, the court held the plea good, as being a sufficient answer to the breach alleged, and therefore gave judgment for the the time of the argument insist upon any furdefendant; although they also were of opinion, that the matter stated in the plea would have entitled the plaintiff to maintain his action, if he had alleged, by way of breach, that the required, but the party demurring may dedefendant prevented the arbitrators from mand a joinder in demurrer, and the opposite making their award. DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE. This happens where a record or other matter is produced in evidence, concerning the legal consequences of which there arises a doubt in law: in which case the adverse party may, if he pleases, demur to the whole evidence; which admits the truth of every fact that has been alleged, but denies the sufficiency of them all in point of law, to maintain or overthrow the issue, as the case may be. 1 Inst. 72: 5 Rep. 104. This draws the question of law from the cognizance of the jury, to be decided, as it ought. that if the prisoner freely discovers the fact in

And in these cases the counsel for the plaintiff and defendant agree on the matter of fact in dispute; and the jury are discharged; and the matter of law is referred to the judges to determine.

DEMURRER TO INDICTMENTS. A demurrer is incident to criminal cases as well as civil, when the fact as alleged is allowed to be true, but the prisoner joins issue upon some point of law in the indictment; by which he insists that the fact, as stated, is no felony, treason, or whatever the crime is alleged to be. Thus, for, instance, if a man be indicted for feloniously stealing a greyhound, which is an animal in which no valuable property can be had, and therefore it is not felony, but only a civil trespass to steal it; in this case the party indicted may demur to the indictment, denying it to be a felony, though he confesses the act of taking it. Some have held (2 Hal. P. C. 257.) that if, on demurrer, the point of law be adjudged against the prisoner, he shall have judgment and execution, as if convicted by verdict. But this is denied by others; (2 Hawk. P. C. c. 32. § 5, 6.) who hold, that in such cases he shall be directed and received to plead the general issue, Not guilty, after a demurrer determined against him; which appears the more reasonable, because it is clear, by the court out of which the record is sent, court, and refers to the opinion of the court, whether it be felony or no; and upon the fact thus shown, it appears to be felony; the court 225. See Carr. C. Law. 49. And this seems most part a mistake in point of law, and in the conduct of his pleading; and though a man by mis-pleading may in some cases lose his property, yet the law will not suffer him by such niceties to lose his life. However, upon this doubt, demurrers to indictments are seldom used; more especially since until a late statute the principal defects of form which occem," and many others, shall no longer be On a demurrer to circumstantial evidence grounds for staying or reversing the judgment. DEODAND, Deo dandum.] By this is meant whatever personal chattel is the immediate occasion of the death of any reasonable creature: which is forfeited to the king to be applied to pious uses, and distributed in alms by his high almoner, though formerly destined to a more superstitious purpose. 1 H. P. C. 419 : Fleta, lib. 1 c. 25.

It seems to have been originally designed as an expiation for the souls of such as were snatched away by sudden death; and for that purpose ought properly to have been given to Holy Church, in the same manner as the apparel of a stranger who was found dead was applied to purchase masses for the good of his soul. And this may account for that rule of law, that no deodand is due, when an infant under the age of discretion is killed by a fall from a cart or horse, or the like, not being in motion; whereas, if an adult person falls from thence, and is killed, the thing is certainly forfeited: 3 Inst. 57: 1 H. P. C. 422; such infant being presumed incapable of actual sin, and therefore not needing a deodand to purchase propitiatory masses. 1 Comm. 300.

Thus stands the law, if a person be killed by a fall from a thing standing still. But if a horse, or ox, or other animal of his own motion, kill as well an infant, as an adult; or if a cart run over him, they shall in either case be forfeited as deodands; which is grounded upon this additional reason, that such misfortunes are in part owing to the negligence of the owner; and therefore he is properly punished by such forfeiture. Bract. l. 3. c. 5.

Where a thing not in motion is the occasion of a man's death, that part only which is the immediate cause is forfeited; as if a man be climbing up the wheel of a cart, and is killed by falling from it, the wheel alone is a deodand. 1 H. P. C. 422. But wherever the thing is in motion, not only that part which immediately gives the wound (as the wheel levy the same on the town, &c. Wherefore which runs over his body,) but all things the inquest ought to find the value of it. 1 which move with it, and help to make the Hawk. P. C. wound more dangerous (as the cart and loading, which increase the pressure of the wheel), are forfeited. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 26.

It matters not whether the owner of the thing moving to the death of a person were concerned in the killing or not: for if a man kills another with my sword, the sword is forfeited. Dr. & Stud. d. 2. c. 51. And therefore in all indictments for homicide, the instrument of death, and the value are presented and found by the grand jury (as that the stroke was given by a certain penknife, value 6d.), that the king or his grantee may claim the deodand. For it is no deodand unless it be presented as such by a jury of twelve men. 3 Inst. 57: 5 Rep. 110: 1 Inst. 144.

No deodands are due for accidents happening upon the high sea, that being out of the jurisdiction of the common law: but if a man falls from a boat or ship in fresh water and is drowned, it hath been said that the vessel and cargo are in strictness of law a deodand. Inst. 58: 1 H. P. C. 423: Moll. de Jur. Marit.

Juries, however, have of late perhaps too frequently taken upon themselves to mitigate these forfeitures by finding only some trifling thing, or part of an entire thing, to have been the occasion of the death. But in such cases, although the finding by the jury be hardly warrantable by law, the Court of K. B. hath generally refused to interfere on behalf of the ford of the franchise, to assist so unequitable a claim. Fost. on Homic. 266.

Deodands, as well as other forfeitures in general, wrecks, treasure-trove, &c. may be granted by the king to particular subjects as a royal franchise: and indeed they are for the most part granted out to the lords of manors or other liberties; to the perversion of their original design. 1 Comm. 299. et seq.

If a man riding over a river, is thrown off his horse by the violence of the water, and drowned, his horse is not deodand; for his death was caused per cursum aquæ. 2 Co. 483.

If a person wounded by any accident, as of a cart, horse, &c., die within a year and a day after, what did it is deodand: so that if a horse strikes a man, and afterwards the owner sells the horse, and then the party that was stricken dies of the stroke, the horse, notwithstanding the sale, shall be forfeited as deodand.

Plowd. 260: 5 Rep. 110.

Things fixed in the freehold, as a bell hanging in a steeple, a wheel of a mill, &c., unless severed from the freehold, cannot be deodands. 2 Inst. 281. And there is no forfeiture of a deodand, till the matter is found of record, by the jury that finds the death, who ought also to find and appraise the deodand. 5 Rep. 110: 1 Inst. 144. After the coroner's inquisition, the sheriff is answerable for the value, where the deodand belongs to the king; and he may

DE ONERANDO PRO RATA POR-TIONIS. An ancient writ, where a person was distrained for rent, that ought to be paid by others proportionably with him. F. N. B. 234. If a man hold twenty acres of land, by fealty and twenty shilling's rent, and he aliens one acre to one person, and another acre to another, &c., the lord shall not distrain one alience for the whole rent, but for the rate and value of the land he hath purchased, &c. And if he be distrained for more, he shall have this writ. New Nat. Br. 586.

DEPARTURE. A term of law properly applied to a defendant, who first pleading one thing in bar of an action, and being replied unto, in his rejoinder, quits that and shows another matter contrary to, or not pursuing his first plea, which is called a departure from his plea: also where a plaintiff in his declaration sets forth one thing, and after the defendant hath pleaded, the plaintiff in his replication shows new matter different from his declaration, this is a departure. Plowd. 7, 8: 2 Inst. 147. But if a plaintiff in his replication depart from his count, and the defendant takes issue upon it, if it be found for the plaintiff, the defendant shall take no advantage of that departure, though it would have been otherwise, if he had demurred upon it. Raym. 86: 1 Lil. Abr. 444.

If a man plead a general agreement in bar, and in his rejoinder allege a special one, this is a departure in pleading : and if an action is brought at common law, and the plaintiff by his replication would maintain it by virtue of a custom, &c.. it hath been held a departure. Nels. Abr. 638. Where a matter is omitted at first, it is a departure to plead it afterwards. Ibid. If in covenant the defendant pleads performance, and after rejoins that the plaintiff ousted him, it is a departure from his plea. Raym. 22. In debt upon bond for performance of covenants in a lease, the defendant pleaded performance; and afterwards in his rejoinder set forth that so much was paid in money, and so much in taxes, &c., upon demurrer it was adjudged a departure from the plea, because he had pleaded performance and afterwards set forth other matter of excuse, &c. 1 Salk. 221.

Debt upon bond for performance of an award, made for payment of money, if the defendant plead performance, and the plaintiff having replied and assigned a breach of nonpayment, &c., the defendant rejoins that he is ready to pay the money at the day, &c., this is a departure from his plea, for performance is payment of the money; and payment, and ready to pay, are different issues. Sid. 10: cery is by depositions of witnesses: and the 4 Leon. 79. In debt upon bond for non-per- copies of such regularly taken and published. formance of an award, the defendant pleads that the award was, that he should release all suits to the plaintiff, which he had done; the plaintiff replies that such an award was made, but that the award was farther, that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff such a sum, &c.; the defendant rejoins that true it is, that by the award he was to pay the plaintiff the said sum, but that the award was also, that the plaintiff should release to the defendant all actions, &c., which he had not done; on demurrer, this was held a departure from the plea, being all new matter. 2 Bulst. 39: Godb. 155: 1 Nels. 637. After nullum fecerunt arbitrium, the defendant cannot plead that the award is void, without being a departure from the former plea; and if where nul tiel agard is pleaded, then the award is set forth, and a joinder that it was not tendered, it is a departure. 1 Lev. 133: Lut. 385.

A departure must be always from something that is material, or it will not be allowed: if in trespass for taking goods, the plaintiff reply, that after the taking, the defendant converted them to his own use, this being an abuse, makes a trespass; and the conversion is either trover or trespass at the plaintiff's election, so that by his replication he may make it trespass, and be no departure, 1 Salk. 221, 222. In circumstances of time, &c., laid as to promises, the plaintiff is not tied to a precise day; for if the defendant by his plea force the plaintiff to vary, it is no departure from his declaration. 1 Nels. 640, 641. And if another place be mentioned in the replication, in action of debt, as this is a personal thing, it is no departure, because he who is indebted to another in one place, is so in every place. Sid. 228.

If new matter which explains or fortifies the bar be rejoined by the defendant, it is not a departure. 1 Wills. 8. 97. 8: Co. Lit. 304. a.

A departure being a denial of what is before admitted, is a saying and unsaying, and for that an issue cannot be joined upon it; it is bad for the uncertainty. 1 Lil. 444. See farther, tits. For the purposes of examining witnesses in or near London there is an examiner's office appointed: but for such as live in the country, a commission to examine witnesses is usually granted to four commissioners, two named of each side, or any three or two of them to take the depositions there. And if the witnesses reside beyond sea, a commission may be had to examine them there upon their own oaths: and if foreigners, upon the oaths of two skilful interpreters. And it hath been established that the deposition of an heathen who believes in the Supreme Being, taken by commission in the most solemn manner according to the custom of his own country may be read in evidence. 1 Atk. 21. The commissioners are sworn to take the examinations truly and without partiality, and not to divulge them till published in the Court of Chancery; and their clerks are also sworn to secrecy. The witnesses are compellable by process of subpæna, as in the courts of common law, to appear and submit to examination. And when their depositions are taken they are transmitted to the court with the same care that the answer of a defendant is sent. 3 Comm. 449.

After a witness is fully examined, the examinations are read over to him, and the witness is at liberty to alter, or amend any thing; after which he signs them, and then and not before, the examinations are complete, and good evidence. 1 P. Wms. 415. The same practice prevails in ecclesiastical causes.

Where a witness was examined in a cause in Chancery, and before signing his examination died, the Master of the Rolls, upon advising with the Master in Chancery then in court, denied the making use of the depositions, as being not perfect. 1 P. Wms. 414.

But where, after an order for publication, defendant examined a witness, and then perceiving the irregularity (it being after publication), the defendant on the usual affidavit by himself, his clerk in court, and solicitor, that they had not seen, nor would not see any of the depositions, got an order to re-examine this witness, but before re-examination the witness died; upon affidavit of this, Lord Ch. J. Parker, ordered that the defendant might make use of the depositions, the re-examination being prevented by the act of God. 1 P. Wms. 415.

DEPRIVATION, deprivatio.] A depriving or taking away; as when a bishop, parson, vicar, &c., is deposed from his preferment. Of deprivations there are two sorts deprivation d beneficio, and ab officio; the deprivation d beneficio is when for some great crime, &c., a minister is wholly deprived of his living: and deprivatio ab officio is where a minister is for ever deprived of his orders, which is also called deposition or degradation, and is commonly for some heinous offence meriting death, and performed by the bishop in a so-lemn manner. Blount. See Degradation.

Deprivatio a beneficio is an act of the Spiritual Court, grounded upon some crime or defect in the person deprived, by which he is discharged from his spiritual promotion or benefice, upon sufficient cause proved against stat. 39 Eliz. c. 8. And by the king's commission, as he hath the supremacy lodged in him, a bishop may be deprived; for since a bishop is vested with that dignity by commission from the king, it is reasonable he should be deprived, where there is just cause, by the same authority: but the canons direct, that a bishop shall be deprived in a synod of the province; or, if that cannot be assembled, by the archbishop and twelve bishops, at least, not as his assistants, but as judges. It has been adjudged, that an archbishop may deprive a bishop for simony, &c., for he hath power over his suffragans, who may be punished in the archbishop's court for any offence against their duty. I Salk. 134. See tit. Bishop.

The causes of deprivation are many: if a clerk obtain a preferment in the church, by simoniacal contract; if he be an excommunicate, a drunkard, fornicator, adulterer, infidel, schismatic, or heretic; or guilty of murder, although he have not such extra manslaughter, perjury, forgery, &c. See tits. Parson Clergy.

If any parson, vicar, &c., have one benefice with cure of souls, and take plurality, without a faculty or dispensation; or if he commit waste in the houses and lands of the church, called dilapidations; all these have been held good causes for deprivation of priests. Degg's Parson's Counseller, 98, 99, &c.: 3 Inst. 204. See tits. Advowson, II., Chaplain, Cession. And refusing to use the Common Prayers of the church, plurality of livings, &c., are causes of deprivation ipso facto, in which case the church shall be void, without any sentence declaratory: and avoidances by act of parliament need no declaratory sentence; but in other cases there must be a declaratory sentence. Dyer, 275. See tit. Parson.

Where a benefice is only voidable, but not void, before sentence of deprivation, the party must be cited to appear; there is to be a libel against him, and a time assigned to answer it, and also liberty for advocates to plead, and after all a solemn sentence pronounced: though none of these formalities are required, where the living is made ipso facto void. Can. 122. If a deprivation be for a thing merely of ecclesiastical cognizance, no appeal lies; but the party has his remedy by a commission of review, which is granted by the king of mere grace. DESCENT, OR HEREDITARY SUCCESSION;

Lat. descensus; Fr. discent; in which latter way the term is usually spelt in all old law books. The title whereby a man on the death of his ancestor obtains the freehold of such ancestor, by right or representation, as his heir at law.—It is otherwise defined; the order

By law no inheritance can vest, nor can any who is next in the line of succession is called Perhaps this word deraign, and the word an heir apparent, or heir presumptive. Heirs deraignment derived from it, may be used in apparent are such, whose right of inheritance is indefeasible, provided they outlive the ancestor; as the eldest son or his issue, who the writers on these subjects to be vinculum must by the course of common law be heir to the father whenever he happens to die. Heirs presumptive are such, who, if the ancestor should die immediately, would, in the present circumstances of things, be his heirs; but whose right of inheritance may be defeated by the contingency of some nearer heir being born; as a brother or nephew, whose presumptive succession may be destroyed by the birth of a child; or a daughter, whose present hopes may hereafter be cut off by the birth of a son. Nay, even if the estate hath descended, by the death of the owner, to such brother, or nephew, or daughter; in the former cases, the estate shall be devested and taken away by the birth of a posthumous child; and in the latter, it shall also be totally devested by the birth of a posthumous son. Bro. tit. Descent. 58.

And besides this case of a posthumous child. if lands are given to a son who dies, leaving a sister his heir; if the parents have at any distance of time afterwards another son, this son shall devest the descent upon the sister, and take the estate as heir to his brother. Co. Lit. 11: Doct. & Stud. d. 2 c. 7. So the same estate may be frequently devested by the subsequent birth of nearer presumptive heirs, before it fixes upon an heir apparent. As if an estate is given to an only child who dies, it may descend to an aunt, who may be stripped of it by an afterborn uncle; on whom a subsequent sister may enter, and who will again be deprived of the estate by the birth of a brother, the heir apparent. Christian's note on 2 Comm. 208. See tit. Posthumous Children, Infant, II.

It seems determined that every one has a right to retain the rents and profits which accrued whilst he was thus legally possessed of the inheritance. I Inst. 11. in n. 2 Wils. 526.—See farther, as to the entry of a posthumous heir, Watkins on Descent, c. 4.

In order to treat the subject the more clearly, it seems better to lay aside such matters as will only tend to cause embarrassment and confusion. The question, who are, and who are not capable of being heirs, comes more properly under the titles Heir, Attainder, Escheat; which see. We may also pass over the frequent division of descents, into those by custom, statute, and common law. As to descendants by particular custom, as to all the sons in gravelkind, or to the youngest in Borough English, see those titles, and title Custom: and as to descents by statute, or fees-tail per formam doni, in pursuance of the stat. of Westm. 2. see tits. Estate, Limitations,

As the law of descents depends not a little on the nature of kindred, and the several degrees of consanguinity, it will be previously necessary to state briefly the true notion of this kindred or alliance in blood.

Consanguinity, or kindred, is defined by personarum ab eodem stipite descendentium: the connexion or relation of persons descended from the same stock or common ancestor. This consanguinity is either lineal or colla-

Lineal consanguinity is that which subsists between persons, of whom one is descended in a direct line from the other, as between a man and his father, grandfather, and greatgrandfather, and so upwards, in the direct ascending line: or between a man and his son, grandson, great grandson, and so downwards in the direct descending line. Every generation, in this lineal direct consanguinity, constitutes a different degree, reckoning either upwards or downwards: the father is related in this first degree, and so likewise is the son: grandsire and grandson in the second; great grandsire and great grandson in the third. This is the only natural way of reckoning the degrees in the direct line, and therefore universally obtains, as well in the civil and canon as in the common law.

Collateral kindred answers to the same description; collateral relations agreeing with the lineal in this, that they descend from the same stock or ancestor; but differing in this, that they do not descend one from the other. Collateral kinsmen are such then as lineally spring from one and the same ancestor, who is the stirps, or root, the stipes, trunk or common stock, from whence these relations are branched out. As if a man hath two sons, who have each a numerous issue; both these issues are lineally descended from him as their common ancestor; and they are collateral kinsmen to each other, because they are all descended from this common ancestor, and all have a portion of his blood in their veins, which denominates them consanguineos.

The very being of collateral consanguinity, consists in this descent from one and the same common ancestor. Thus A. and his brother are related; Why? Because both are derived from one father: A. and his first cousin are related; Why? Because both descended from the same grandfather; and his second cousin's claim to consanguinity is this, that they are both derived from one and the same great grandfather. In short, as many ancestors as a man has, so many common stocks he has, from which collateral kinsmen may be derived.

The method of computing these degrees in the canon law, which our law has adopted (Co. Lit. 23.) is as follows: --- We begin at the common ancestor, and reckon downwards; and in whatsoever degree the two persons, or the most remote of them, is distant from the common ancestor, that is the degree in which they are related to each other. Thus A. and his brother are related in the first degree; for from the father to each of them is counted only one: A. and his nephew are related in the second degree; for the nephew is two depressions of the case and the nature of the title shall regrees removed from the common ancestor; quire, the person last entitled to the land shall, viz. his own grandfather, the father of A. 2 for the purposes of this act, be considered to have been the purchaser thereof upless it shall

By the recent stat. 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 106. many important alterations have been made in the law of descent.

The first section enacts, "That the words and expressions hereinafter mentioned, which in their ordinary signification have a more confined or a different meaning, shall in this act, except where the nature of the provision or the context of the act shall exclude such construction, be interpreted as follows: (that is to say,) the word ' land' shall extend to manors, advowsons, messuages, and all other hereditaments, whether corporeal or incorporeal, and whether freehold or copyhold, or of any other tenure, and whether descendible according to the common law, or according to the custom of gavelkind or borough-English, or any other custom, and to money to be laid out in the purchase of land, and to chattels and other personal property transmissible to heirs, and also to any share of the same hereditaments and properties or any of them, and to any estate of inheritance, or estate for any life or lives, or other estate transmissible to heirs, and to any possibility, right, or title of entry or action, and any other interest capable of being inherited, and whether the same estates, possibilities, rights, titles, and interests, or any of them, shall be in possession, reversion, remainder, or contingency; and the words 'the purchaser,' shall mean the per-son who last acquired the land otherwise than by descent, or than by any escheat, partition, or inclosure, by the effect of which the land shall have become part of or descendible in the same manner as other land acquired by descent; and the word 'descent' shall mean the title to inherit land by reason of consanguinity, as well where the heir shall be an ancestor or collateral relation, as where he shall be a child or other issue; and the expression 'descendants' of any ancestor shall extend to all persons who must trace their descent through such ancestor; and the expression 'the person last entitled to land' shall extend to the last person who had a right thereto, whether he did or did not obtain the possession or the receipt of the rents and profits thereof; and the word 'assurance' shall mean any deed or instrument (other than a will) by which any land shall be conveyed or transferred at law or in equity; and every word importing the singular number only shall extend and be applied to several persons or things as well as one person or thing; and every word importing the masculine gender only shall extend and be applied to a female as well as a male."

By § 2. it is enacted, "That in every case descent shall be traced from the purchaser; acquired the land as a devisce, and not by and to the intent that the pedigree may never be carried further back than the circumstances limited, by any assurance executed after the

of the case and the nature of the title shall require, the person last entitled to the land shall, for the purposes of this act, be considered to have been the purchaser thereof unless it shall be proved that he inherited the same; in which case the person from whom he inherited the same shall be considered to have been the purchaser unless it shall be proved that he inherited the same; and in like manner the last person from whom the land shall be proved to have been inherited shall in every case be considered to have been the purchaser, unless it shall be proved that he inherited the same.

This section abolishes the old rule of law. which was of feudal origin, and was expressed in the maxim seisina facit stipitem. person could become an ancestor from whom lands might be inherited, unless he had the seisin thereof, either by entry, or by the possession of a tenant for years, or, in the case of the freehold being in lease, had received rent, or exercised some act of ownership. Where an estate descended to one who died without having had actual or constructive possession, in tracing the inheritance he was passed over. and the person last seised became the root or stock from which such inheritance was derived. It is obvious that this law was productive of much inconvenience and uncertainty. On the death of the individual last entitled, it became necessary to inquire into the state of the property, from the time his title accrued till the period of his decease. Nor was it an improbable result that his estate would be split into portions, and go to parties standing towards him, or towards the person by whom it was last enjoyed, in very different degrees of relationship. Besides reversions and remainders, there was another kind of property which did not admit of actual posses-To make himself the root or stock from which incorporcal hereditaments might be inherited, a party must have exercised some act of ownership over them, as by presenting to an advowson, &c.; while equitable estates were, in all instances, subject to a constructive possession created by the law. These anomalies induced the real property commissioners to recommend the abolition of the rule, and the passing of the above enactment, which places every species of inheritable property, whether in possession or in reversion, on the same footing, and makes it descendible to the heirs of the person last entitled, although he may never have had seisin. See 1 Real. Prop.

The first part of this section alters an old established rule of law. In order to explain the changes introduced by both clauses of the section, it is requisite to advert to the modes of acquiring property, which by our law are reduced to two, viz. descent and purchase. the seven rules or canons of inheritance laid down by Mr. Justice Blackstone in his second volume with his explanatory comments, were inserted, four of which, viz. the second, third, fourth, and seventh, remain uninfringed by the above statute. It is advisable still to give them all, briefly noticing such as have been modified.

I. The first rule was, that inheritance should lineally DESCEND to the issue of the person who last died actually seised, in infinitum;

but should never lineally ASCEND.

The former part of this rule, regarding the necessity of seisin by the person from whom the descent is to be traced, is altered by § 2. and the reverse of the latter part enacted by § 6. of the late statute. See sections ante. The first portion of the rule may be stated now to be, that inheritance shall lineally descend to the issue of the person who died last entitled, in infinitum.

II. A second general rule, or canon, is, that the male issue shall be admitted before the female. Thus sons shall be admitted before daughters; or, as our law expresses it, the worthiest of blood shall be preferred. Hale, H. C. L. 235. As if one hath two sons and two daughters, and dies; first the eldest son, (and in case of his death without issue) then the youngest son, shall be admitted to the succession in preference to both the daughmust be deduced from feudal principles; for, wherein the necessity of a sole and deterby the genuine and original policy of that minate succession is as great in the one sex constitution, no female could ever succeed to as in the other. 1 Inst. 165. And the right a proper feud, inasmuch as females were in- of sole succession, though not of primogenicapable of performing those military services ture, was also established with respect to for the sake of which that system was established. But our law does not extend to a a man holds an earldom to him and the heirs total exclusion of females, as the Salic law and of his body, and dies, leaving only daughters, though daughters are excluded by sons, yet they succeed before any collateral relations.

And see § 7. of the new statute as to the preference to be given to paternal ancestors and their descendants before maternal ancestors and their descendants, and as regards each class to the males before the females.

III. A third rule, or canon, of descent, is. that where there are two or more males in equal degree, the eldest only shall inherit, but the females all together.

As if a man hath two sons and two daugh. ters, and dies, his eldest son shall alone succeed to his estate, in exclusion of the second son and both the daughters; but if both the sons die without issue before the father, the daughters shall both inherit the estate as coparceners. Litt. § 5: Hale, H. C. L. 238.
This rule is also of feudal origin, and arose

land by William the Conqueror.

Yet we find that socage estates frequently descended to all the sons equally so lately as when Glanvil wrote, in the reign of Henry II., and it is mentioned in the Mirror (c. 1. & 3.), as a part of our ancient constitution, that knights' fees should descend to the eldest son, and socage fees should be partible among male children. However, in Henry III.'s time, it appears from Bracton (l. 2. c. 30, 1.), that socage lands, in imitation of lands in chivalry, had almost entirely fallen into the right of succession by primogeniture, as the law now stands; except in Kent, where they gloried in the preservation of their ancient gavelkind tenure, of which a principal branch was the joint inheritance of all the sons; and except in some particular manors and townships, where their local customs continued the descent sometimes to all, sometimes to the youngest son only, or in other more singular methods of succession.

As to the females, they are still left as they were by the ancient law; for they were all equally incapable of performing any personal service; and therefore one main reason for preferring the eldest ceasing, such preference would have been injurious to the rest; and the other principal purpose, the prevention of the too minute subdivision of estates, was left to be considered and provided for by the lords who had the disposal of these female heiresses in marriage. However, the succession by promogeniture, even among females, The true reason of preferring the males took place as to the inheritance of the crown; the eldest shall not of course be countess, but (if living) would have done the same; and the dignity is in suspense or abeyance till the among these several issues, or representatives Abeyance, Peers, Parceners.

IV. A fourth rule, or canon, of descent, is, that the lineal descendants, in infinitum, of any person deceased, shall represent their an-

child (either male or female) of an eldest son, hath only three daughters, C., D., and E., and succeeds before a younger son, and so in infinitum. Hale, H. C. L. 236, 7. And these daughters, and E. leaving a daughter and a representatives shall take neither more nor son, who is younger than his sister: here less, but just so much as their principals when the grandfather dies, the eldest son of would have done. As if there be two sisters, C. shall succeed to one third, in exclusion of and one dies, leaving six daughters, and then the younger; and the two daughters of D. the father of the two sisters dies, without to another third, in partnership; and the son other issue; these six daughters shall take of E. to the remaining third, in exclusion of among them exactly as much as their mother his elder sister. And the same right of reprewould have done had she been living; that is, sentation, guided and restrained by the same a moiety of the lands in coparcenary: so that, rules of descent, prevails downwards in infi-upon partition made, if the land be divided nitum. into twelve parts, the surviving sister shall; have six parts, and her six nicces one part and other cases in the course of this title, may each.

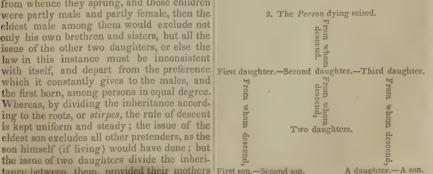

This taking by representation is called succession in stirpes, according to the roots; since all the branches inherit the same share that their root, whom they represent, would have done. So if the next heirs of a man be six nieces, three by one sister, two by another and one by a third, his inheritance, by the laws of England, is divided only into three parts, and distributed per stirpes, thus, one third to the three children who represent one sister, another third to the two who represent the second, and the remaining third to the one child who is the sole representative of her mother.

This mode of representation is a necessary consequence of the double preference given by our law, first to the male issue, and next to the first born among the males. For if all the children of three sisters were to claim per capita, in their own right, as next of kin to the ancestor, without any respect to the stocks from whence they sprung, and those children were partly male and partly female, then the eldest male among them would exclude not only his own brethren and sisters, but all the issue of the other two daughters, or else the law in this instance must be inconsistent which it constantly gives to the males, and the first born, among persons in equal degree. Whereas, by dividing the inheritance according to the roots, or stirpes, the rule of descent is kept uniform and steady; the issue of the eldest son excludes all other pretenders, as the son himself (if living) would have done; but the issue of two daughters divide the inheritance between them, provided their mothers First son. - Second son.

king shall declare his pleasure; for he, being of the respective roots, the same preference to the fountain of honour, may confer it on males and the same right of primogeniture which of them he pleases. Ibid. See tits. obtain as would have obtained at the first among the roots themselves, the sons or daughters of the deceased. As if a man hath two sons, A. and B., and A. dies, leaving two sons, and then the grandfather dies; now the eldest son of A. shall succeed to the whole of cestor; that is, stand in the same place as the his grandfather's estate; and if A. had left person himself would have done had he been only two daughters, they should have succeeded also to equal moieties of the whole, in Thus the child, grandchild, or great grand- exclusion of B. and his issue. Vol. I.—70

King John, however, who kept his nephew by tracing his descent through such lineal Arthur from the throne, by disputing this right of representation, did all in his power to abolish it throughout the realm. Hale, H. C. L. 217. 229. But in the time of his son, King Henry III., the rule was indisputably settled in the manner here laid down; Bract. l. 2. c. 30. § 2; and so it has continued ever since. And thus much for lineal descents.

V. A fifth rule was, that on failure of lineal descendants, or issue of the person last seised, the inheritance should descend to his collateral relations, being of the blood of the first purchaser, subject to the three preceding rules. Thus if A. purchased land, and it descended to B. his son, who died seised thereof without issue; whoever succeeded to this inheritance, must have been of the blood of A., the first purchaser of this family. Co. Litt. 12. The first purchaser, perquisitor, was he who first acquired the estate to his family, whether the same was transferred to him by sale or by gift, or by any other method except only that of descent.

This was a rule almost peculiar to our own laws, and those of a similar original; and cannot otherwise be accounted for than by recurring to feudal principles, which did not originally permit the descent of lands to any but one of the lineal descendants of the first purchaser, who in the case of a feudum novum, or estate purchased by the ancestor himself, could only be of his own offspring; so that such estate could not descend even to his brother. See this Dict. tit. Tenures, 1. 3.

But when the feudal rigour was in part abated, a method was invented to let in the collateral relations of the grantce to the inheritance, by granting him a feudum novum to hold ut feudum antiquum; that is, with all the qualities annexed of a feud derived from his ancestors; and then the collateral relations were admitted to succeed even in infinitum, because they might have been of the blood of, that is, descended from, the first imaginary purchaser.

Of this nature are all the grants of fee-simple estates of this kingdom; for there is now in the law of England no such thing as a grant of a feudum novum to be held ut novum, unless in the case of a fee-tail, and there this rule is strictly observed, and none but the lineal descendants of the first donee (or purchaser) are admitted: but every grant of lands in fee-simple is with us a feudum novum, to he held ut antiquum, as a feud whose antiquity is indefinite; and therefore the collateral kindred of the grantee, or descendants from any of his lineal ancestors, by whom the lands might possibly have been purchased, are capable of being called to the inheritance.

ancestor, or in consequence of their being no such lineal ancestor. See section ante. Subject, however, to the precedence thus given to the lineal ancestors of the purchaser, and to the change in the law with respect to the admission of the half-blood, his collateral relations will succeed to the inheritance in the order established by the old law; as for instance, a brother will take before an uncle, and the latter before a more distant relation.

VI. A sixth rule, or canon, was, that the collateral heir of the person last seised must have been his next collateral kinsman of the whole blood.

This rule is altered by § 9. of the new statute, by which the half-blood is allowed to inherit next after any relation in the same degree of the whole blood and his issue, where the common ancestor shall be a male; and next after the common ancestor, where such common ancestor shall be a female. See section ante.

VII. The seventh and last rule, or canon, is, that in collateral inheritances the male stocks shall be preferred to the female (that is, kindred derived from the blood of the male ancestors, however remote, shall be admitted before those of the blood of the female, however near), unless where the lands have, in fact, descended from a female.

Thus the relations on the father's side are admitted in infinitum, before those on the mother's side are admitted at all. Lit. § 4. And the relations of the father's father before those of the father's mother, and so on. This rule seems to have been established in order to effectuate and carry into execution the rule, or principal canon of collateral inheritance, before referred to, by which every heir must have been of the blood of the first purchaser.

That this was the true foundation of the preference of the agnati, or male stocks, in our law, will farther appear, if we consider that, whenever the lands have notoriously descended to a man from his mother's side, this rule is totally reversed: and no relation of his by the father's side, as such, can ever be admitted to them, because he cannot possibly be of the blood of the first purchaser. And so e converso if the lands descended from the father's side, no relation of the mother, as such, shall ever inherit. 1 Inst. 14. See Watkins on Descent, c. 5.

have entered on and possessed the land so aliened, but must have brought their writ, and sought to recover possession by law. 3 Comm. 172: 1 Inst. 325: F. N. B. 191. 4.

In the case of a disseisin (see that title), while the possession remained in the disseisor, it was a mere naked possession unsupported by any right; and the disseisee might have restored his own possession, and put a total end to the possession of the disseisor by an entry on the land, without any previous action; but if the disseisor died, his heir came to the possession of the estate by a lawful title: it was the same if the disseisor aliened: the alience came in by a lawful title. By reason of this lawful title, the heir in the first instance, and the alience in the second, acquired a presumptive right of possession, which was so far good, that even the person disseised lost by it his right to recover the possession by entry, and could only recover it by an action at law. When the right of entry was thus lost, and the party could only recover by action, the possession was said to be discontinued. This was the general import of the word discontinuance; but in its usual acceptation it signified the effect of alienations made by husbands seised in right of their wives; by ecclesiastics seised in right of their church; or by tenants in tail; those being the three instances adduced by Littleton of discontinuance. Thus before the stat. 11 H. 7. c. 20. the alienation of a woman seised of an estate in dower, or of an estate of the gift of her husband, or of any of his ancestors, was said to be a discontinuance; and before the stats. 32 H.S.c. 31. 14 Eliz.c. 8. recoveries suffered by tenants for life, tenants by the curtesy, or tenants in tail after Lit. 33: 2 Danv. The learning upon this subject, which was formerly an important branch of the law, has now become more curious than useful; as by 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 27. § 39. no discontinuance made after the 31st December, 1833, shall toll or defeat any right of entry or action for the recovery of land.

DISCONTINUANCE OF PLEA. Where divers things should be pleaded to, and some are omitted, this is a discontinuance. 1 Nels. Abr. 660, 661. If a defendant's plea begin with an answer to part, and answers no more, it is a discontinuance: and the plaintiff may take judgment by nil dicit for what is not answered: but if the plaintiff plead over, the whole 1 Salk. 139. Salk. 180. Where no answer is given to one part, if the plaintiff pleads thereto, he cannot have judgment according to his declaration; for which reason it may be a discontinuance of the whole. 1 Nels. 660. DISCONTINUANCE OF PROCESS. This discontinuance is somewhat similar to a nonsuit; for when a plaintiff leaves a chasm in the proceedings of his cause, as by not continuing the process regularly from day to day, and by a side bar rule on payment of costs. The plaintiff cannot discontinue his action after a demurrer joined, and entered; or after a verdict, or a writ of inquiry, without leave of the court. Cro. Jac. 35: 1 Lil. Abr. 473. Sid. 84.

It has been ruled, upon a motion to discontinue, that the court may give leave after a special verdict, which is not complete and final, but never after a general verdict. Salk. 178. See Hardw. 200, 1. So after inquiry executed and returned. Carth. 31.

DISCOVERY. The act of revealing or disclosing any matter by a defendant in his answer to a bill filed against him in a court of equity. See tit. Chancery.

To administer to the ends of justice, without pronouncing a judgment which may affect any rights, the courts of equity, in many cases, compel a discovery. This jurisdiction is exercised to assist the administration of justice, in the prosecution or defence of some other suit, either in the court of equity itself, or in some other court: and a discovery has been compelled to aid the jurisdiction of a foreign court. But if a bill be brought to aid, by discovery, the prosecution or defence of any proceeding, not merely civil, in any other court, as an indictment or information, a court of equity will not exercise its jurisdiction to compel a discovery; and the defendant may demur. 2 Vos. 3.88. And in the case of suits merely civil in a court of ordinary jurisdiction, if that court can itself compel the discovery required, a court of equity will not interfere. 1 Ath. 255: 1 Ves. 205: 2 Ves. 451.

A bill for a discovery must show an interest in the plaintiff in the subject to which the required discovery relates; and such an interest as entitles him to call on the defendant for the discovery. See Finch, Rep. 36. may in some cases be compelled to discover 44: 1 Vern. 399.

As the object of a court of equity in compelling a discovery is either to enable itself or some other court to decide on matters in dispute between the parties, the discovery sought must be material, either to the relief prayed by the bill, or to some other suit actually instituted, or capable of being instituted. If, therefore, the plaintiff does not show by his bill such a case as renders the discovery which he seeks material to the relief, if he pray relief; or does not show a title to sue the defendant in some other court: or that he is actually involved in litigation with the defendant, or liable to be so; and does not also show that the discovery which he prays is material to enable him to support or defend a suit; he shows no title to the discovery; and consequently a demurrer to the bill for such purpose will be allowed. See Finch, Rep. 214: 1 Ves. 205: 2 Ves. 396.

9: 2 Atk. 388: 1 Vern. 204.

The situation of a defendant may render it improper for a court of equity to compel a discovery; either, 1. Because the discovery may subject the defendant to pains and penalties, or to some forfeiture, or something in the nature of a forfeiture; or, 2. It may hazard his title in a case where, in conscience, he has at least an equal right with the person requiring the discovery; though that right may not be clothed with a perfect legal title; as to which latter, see 1 Ves. 205: 3 Atk. 453. It is a general rule that no one is bound to answer so as to subject himself to punishment, in whatever manner that punishment may arise (as by pains and penalties, a criminal prosecution, &c.); or whatever may be the nature of the punishment. 2. Ves. 245. 251: 1 Ves. 246: 1 Eq. Ab. 131. p. 10: 1 Atk. 450: 2 Atk. 393: Viner, tit. Usury, Q. 4: Toth. 135.

But if the plaintiff alone is entitled to the penalties, and expressly waives them by his bill, the defendant shall be compelled to make the discovery; for it can no longer subject him to a penalty. 1 Vern. 60. And though a discovery may subject a defendant to penalties, to which the plaintiff is not entitled, and which consequently he cannot waive, yet if the defendant has expressly covenanted not to plead or demur to the discovery sought, which is the common case with respect to servants of the East India Company, he shall be compelled to answer. Lq. Ab. 77, 8. Where, too, a person, by his own agreement, subjects himself to a payment in the nature of a penalty on his doing a particular act, a demurrer to discovery of that act will not be allowed.

It seems, however, that a demurrer will be allowed to any discovery which may tend to show the defendant guilty of any moral turpitude, as the birth of a child out of wedlock. Park. 163: but see 2 Ves. 451. But a mother where her child was born, though it may lead to prove the child an alien. 294.

A defendant may likewise demur to a bill which may subject him to any forfeiture of interest; as if a bill be brought to discover whether a lease has been assigned without a license; or whether a defendant entitled during widowhood, or liable to forfeiture of a act at discretion, is bound by the rule of realegacy in case of marriage without consent, is married: or to discover any matter which may subject a defendant entitled to any office yet he is circumscribed, that what he does be or a franchise to a quo warranto. See Toth. 69: 1 Ves. 56: 2 C. R. 68: 2 Atk. 392: 2 Ves. 265: 1 Eq. Ab. 131. c. 10.

A defendant may in the same manner demur to a discovery which may subject him to any thing in the nature of a forfeiture. See 3 Atk. 457: 2 Comm. 661: 3 Bac. Abr.: 3 Atk. 453.

But a defendant cannot protect himself from answering a bill for discovery, by showing that the answer must relate to matters which could be of no use to the party in action pending at law. 3 Price, 489. Nor can he by disclaimer deprive the plaintiff of the right to require a full answer from him, unless it is evident that after such disclaimer he ought not to be retained as a party to the suit. 2 Russ. 458.

to discover his own case, is confined to matters of title, and does not extend to matters of account. 1 Younge & J. 426. Where relief is prayed, and discovery only as ancillary to that relief, the discovery cannot be obtained. 2 Younge & J. 33. The court will not compel a defendant to answer allegations which may subject him to penalties, and the protection extends not only to the particular question, but to every link in the chain of proof. Where the chairman of a joint stock company, with a knowledge that the company had been the fruits of the earth, and of beasts, or ladissolved, and that the managing committee had determined to buy up the shares, sent his shares into market and sold them as good and available shares, the court protected him from answering the allegations, on the ground that there existed a reasonable probability he might be indicted for fraud. 2 Younge &. J. A broker in London has, however, been held bound to answer a bill of discovery in aid of an action brought against him for misconduct, though the discovery would subject him to the penalty of a bond given to the corporation on his admission. 1 Sim. DISSEISIN. From the Fr. Dissaisin.

A species of injury by ouster to the freehold estate of another. A wrongful putting out of him that is seised of the freehold. 1 Inst. 277. As where a person enters into lands or tenements, and his entry is not lawful, and keeps him that hath the estate from the posession thereof. Bract. lib. 4. c. 3. And disseisin is of two sorts; either single disseisin, committed without force of arms, or disseisin by force; but this latter is more properly deforcement. Brit. cap. 42, 43.

By Magna Charta, 9 H. 3. c. 29. no man is to be disseised or put out of his freehold, but by lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

Seisin is a technical term to denote the completion of that investiture by which the tenant was admitted into the tenure, and without which no freehold could be constituted, or pass. Disseisin must, therefore, mean the turning the tenant out of his tenure, and usurping his place and feudal relation. Lord Mansfield. in the case of Taylor, ex dem. Atkins v. Horde, 1 Burr. 60: 5 Bro. P. C. 247.

necessary that the disseisor had not a right of entry (or, to use the old law expression, that his entry was not congeable); that the person disseised was, at the time of the disseisin, in the actual possession of the lands; that the disseisor expelled him from them by some degree of constraint or force; and that he substituted himself to be tenant to the lord. But to be remedied by entry only, without any DISPENSATION. See title Bishops; and I how this substitution was effected it is difficult, perhaps impossible, now to discover. 1 Inst. 266. b. in. n.; 350. b. in. n.: the latter a very long and abstruse note on the subject, and entering fully into the principles of the case above mentioned.

The injuries of abatement and intrusion (see those titles) are by a wrongful entry where the possession is vacant; but this of disseisin is an attack upon him who is in actual possession, and turning him out of it. The former were an ouster from a freehold in law: this is an ouster from a freehold in deed. Disseisin may be effected either in corporeal inheritances, or in incorporeal. Disseisin of things corporeal, as of houses, lands, &c. must be by entry, and actual dispossession of the freehold; Co. Lit. 181; as if a man enter either by force or fraud into the house of another, and turn, or at least keep, him or his servants out of possession. Disseisin of incorporeal hereditaments cannot be an actual dispossession, for the subject itself is neither capable of actual bodily possession, nor dispossession; but it depends on their respective natures and various kinds, being in general nothing more than a disturbance of the owner in the means of coming at or enjoying them. But all disseisins of hereditaments incorporeal are only so at the election and choice of the party injured; if, for the sake of more easily trying the right, he be pleased to suppose himself disseised. Litt. § 588, 589. Otherwise, as there can be no actual dispossession, he cannot be compulsively disseised of any incorporeal hereditaments.

And so, too, even in corporeal hereditaments, a man may, frequently suppose himself to be disseised when he is not so in fact, for the sake of entitling himself to the more easy and commodious remedy of an issue of novel disseisin, instead of being driven to the more tedious process of a writ of entry. Heng. Paro. c. 7: 4 Burr. 110.

The true injury of an actual or compulsive disseisin, according to what has been already stated, seems to be that of dispossessing the tenant, and substituting oneself to be the tenant of the lord in his stead; in order to which, in the times of pure feodal tenure, the consent or connivance of the lord, who upon every descent or alienation personally gave, and who therefore alone could change, the seisin or investiture, seems to have been considered as necessary. But when, in process of time, the feodal form of alienations wore off, and To constitute an actual disseisin, it was the lord was no longer the instrument of giving actual seisin, it is probable that the lord's acceptance of rent or service from him who had dispossessed another might constitute a complete disseisin. Afterwards no regard was had to the lord's concurrence, but the dispossessor himself was considered the sole disseisor; and this wrong was then allowed form of law, as against the disseisor himself; the injury is done, or of the act which is combut required a legal process against his heir or alience. And when the remedy by assise was introduced under Henry II., to redress such disseisins as had been committed within a few years next preceding, the facility of that remedy induced others, who were wrongfully kept out of the freehold, to feign or allow themselves to be seised merely for the sake of the remedy. 3 Comm. 169. &c.

A disseisin may be committed by a mere stranger, or by one who is entrusted with the possession, as a tenant at years, or tenant at will. Br. Ab. Disseisin, 3. 64. 66: T. Jones, 317. If the act be committed by tenant for life, it cannot, as it has been said, be properly called a disseisin; and when committed by tenant in tail, or one who is seised in autre droit, it is a discontinuance, and not a dis-

freehold, it can only be accomplished by means adequate to transfer the freehold. Thus, if the act be committed by a stranger, an assumption of the property in the freehold is necessary. If he enter upon the lands merely, asserting his rights, had proved a better title this is no disseisin; he must enter and oust the true owner, which ouster may be by expressly claiming the freehold, or by taking the profits. Co. Lit. 181. a. According to Lord Holt, a bare entry only, without an expulsion, makes such a seisin only that the law will adjudge him in possession who has the right; but it will not work a disseisin or abatement without actual expulsion. Anon. 1 Salk 246; and see Lit. sect. 701. Whatever may have been the doctrine formerly, it seems to be now established law, that in order to cause a disseisin, the act must be such, that an intention to disseise may be inferred from Cro. Car. 304: 3 Price, 575: 12 East. 141: 3 Maule & S. 271. Nor does this rule militate in any degree against the old and correct distinction between actual disseisin and disseisin at election. It is said in some modern cases, that in order to constitute a disseisin, there must be a wrongful entry. Per Bayley, J., 5 Barn, & A. 689: 3 Maule & S. 271. But this doctrine must not be understood to affect the operation of a feotiment made by tenant for years during the continuance of the term, which creates a dis-

The doctrine of disseisin at election has been much discussed in modern times; and, according to the view of the subject taken by Lord Mansfield, it is difficult to imagine a case in which an actual disseisin can at the present day be committed. Atkyns v. Horde, This opinion has been most ably controverted by Mr. Butler; Co. Lit. 330. b. note 1; and the question may, perhaps, be considered as still open to discussion. It seems that the doctrine of disseisin at election is to eth or puts another out of his land, without be confined to those cases in which, either on order of law; and a disseisee is he that is so mitted, no actual disseisin can take place; but that in every case where the property is susceptible of such an injury, and the act has all the qualities necessary to constitute a disseisin, it is not in the power of the injured party to elect, whether or not he will consider himself disseised. Roscoe on Real Actions, 61.

A disseisor gained a mere naked possession that might have been put an end to by the disseisee entering and restoring his own possession, which he could have done at any time during the life of the disseisor, provided the latter retained the land. But if the disseisor died or aliened, the disseisee's right of entry was taken away, and his only remedy was by action. The reasons why a descent to an heir, or an alienation to a third person, was allowed to work such an alteration in the condition of the disseisee's title, were, that the As a disseisin is a wrongful ouster of the heir and the alienee, taking by act of law, were presumed to come in under a lawful title; and, therefore, the law would not suffer their possession to be disturbed until the claimant, who had been guilty of neglect in not sooner in open court. As, however, a disseisor might have died before the disseisee had had an opportunity of restoring his possession by entry, the power of a descent to the heir, to take away a right of entry, was restricted by the 23 H. 8. c. 38. to cases where the disseisor had been in peaceable possession for five years previous to his death, without entry or claim from the person having lawful title. And this continued to be the law until the passing of 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 27. which, by § 39. enacts, that no descent, cast after the 31st December, 1833, shall toll or defeat any right of entry or action for the recovery of land. See tit.

> Assises that lie against disseisors are called writs of disseisin; and there are several writs of entry sur disseisn, of which some are in the per, and others in the post; but it seems unnecessary to enumerate and distinguish them here, as they all have been long disused, and are speedily to be abolished. For by § 36 of the 3 and 4 W. 4 c. 27. no writ of assise of novel disseisin, writ of entry sur disseisin, in the quibus, in the per, in the per and cui, or in the post, shall be brought after the 31st December, 1834; which time, by § 37. is prolonged to the 1st June, 1835, in the cases therein mentioned.

Those who wish for further information on the subject of disscisin, and the nature of the above writs, may consult 3 Comm. c. 10. and Booth & Roscoe on Real Actions. Also see this Dictionary, tit. Assise of Novel Disseisin; which was printed off before the alteration of the law.

A name bestowed on DISSENTERS. those who dissent from the Church of England, and refuse to partake of her communion. Under this designation is comprehended a variety of sects, who, differing among themselves on many points, agree in rejecting the forms and discipline of the establishment. No sooner had the latter succeeded in throwing off the yoke of Rome, than she asserted her own supremacy, and endeavoured to impose her doctrines upon the whole nation. With the view of creating a uniform system of faith and mode of worship throughout the realm, various acts were passed during the reign of Elizabeth and her immediate successors. these, non-attendance at church, persuading others from attending, impugning the sovereign's ecclesiastical authority, or being present at what were termed unlawful conventicles, were visited with heavy punishments, extending, in some instances, to imprisonment or banishment for life. It is only charitable to attribute such enactments rather to the intolerance of the age, than of the church they were designed to protect. They were undoubtedly framed in times when the principles of religious liberty were little understood, and rarely practised, even by the dissenters themselves. It is fortunately now unnecessary to trace the progress of the prosecution endured by the latter, and which kept augmenting in severity down to the period of the Revolution. Having been previously denied the freedom of worship, they were, by the 13 Car. 2. st. 2. c. 1., and the 25 Car. 2. c. 2., commonly called the Test and Corporation Acts, deprived of their civil rights, and excluded from all places of honour and profit under the crown, and from all offices of trust among their fellow citizens. After the Revolution dissenters were, for the first time, allowed by the Toleration Act to exercise their religion under certain restrictions; and were, on the taking of the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and subscribing the declaration against popery, relieved from the penalties of nonconformity. But it was not until the year 1828, and after many fruitless efforts, that they were successful in obtaining a repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. By the 9 G. 4. c. 17. a declaration is substituted for the sa- duly qualified are allowed to preach in any cramental test imposed by those statutes, and every class of his Majesty's protestant subjects placed on an equal footing, as regards their elegibility to offices and employments, either under the government, or in any city or corporation.

The law, however, still requires dissenters to register their places of worship, and certain oaths and declarations to be taken and sub-place of such articles.

1. As to dissenting places of worship.—By the 52 G. 3. c. 155. § 2. no congregation or assembly for religious worship of protestants. consisting of more than twenty persons, besides the family and servants in whose house the meeting is held, shall be permitted, unless the place of meeting (if not registered under former acts) shall be certified to the bishop of the diocese, the archdeacon, or the quarter sessions, and subsequently registered in the manner therein mentioned. And every person permitting any such meeting in any place occupied by him until the same shall have been so certified, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding 201., or less than 20s.

By § 11. the doors of places where such meetings are held are not to be locked or fastened, under a penalty not exceeding 201.

By § 12. any person wilfully disturbing any meeting for religious worship, permitted by that or any former act, or molesting any person officiating or assembled there, shall, upon conviction at the sessions, suffer the penalty of 401.

By 7 and 8 G. 4. c. 30. § 8. persons demolishing, pulling down, or destroying, or beginning to demolish, pull down, or destroy, any dissenting chapel duly registered, are guilty of felony, and shall suffer death. And by c. 31. of the same session, § 2. the hundred shall make full compensation for the damage done, which, if under 30l., may (by § 8.) be awarded by two justices in petty sessions.

By 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 30. all chapels and other places of religious worship are exempted from poor and church rates.

2. As to dissenting ministers.—They seem to be still liable to the penalties enacted by the Act of Uniformity (1 Eliz. c. 2), for not using the service of the Common Prayer-book, or using any other service in lieu thereof.
By the Toleration Act (1 W. & M. st. 1. c.

18. § 8.) dissenting ministers, in addition to the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and the declaration against popery to be taken and made by other dissenters, were required to subscribe the articles of religion mentioned in the 13 Eliz. c. 12., with the exception of the 34th, 35th, and 36th, and part of the 20th, to exempt them from the penalties imposed by various statutes passed in the reign of Charles II. for officiating in any congregation permit-

IV. Of the Statutes regulating the Sale of Distresses, &c.—(See further as to distress, 3 Comm. 6. 145. and in the several abridgments, tits. Distress, Rent, and Replevin; and also Gilbert on Replevins. See also stats. 2 W. & M. st. 1. c. 5: 8 Anne, c. 14: 4 G. 2. c. 28: 11 G. 2. c. 19.)

These statutes have made great alterations in the ancient law of distress, particularly by empowering persons who distrain for rent of any kind, to sell the distress for payment of rent in arrear, if the tenant or owner fails to replevy, with sufficient security, within five days after taking of the distress and giving the tenant notice of the cause: in this case the constable is bound to assist; the goods are to be appraised, by two sworn appraisers, and the overplus, if any, left in the constable's hands for the use of the owner. This improvement of the remedy by distress was first introduced by stat. 2 W. & M. c. 5. with respect to rents due on demise, or contract; law no subject can distrain out of his fee or

By stat. 57 G. 3. c. 93. regulations are made for restraining the charges of distresses for rent not exceeding 201., and persons aggrieved may be relieved by one justice of peace, who shall adjudge the party transgressing to pay troble the amount received by him contrary to the act. DISTURBANCE is usually a wrong done to some incorporcal hereditament, by hindering or disquieting the owner in his regular and lawful enjoyment of it. Finch, L. 187. Blackstone enumerates five kinds of this injury, viz .- 1. Disturbance of franchises. 2. Disturbance of common. 3. Disturbance of way. 4. Disturbance of tenure. 5. Disturb. ance of patronage.

1. Disturbance of franchises happens when a man has the franchise of holding a courtleet, or keeping a fair or market, of free warren, of taking toll, of seizing waifs or strays, or (in short) any other species of franchise whatsoever; and he is disturbed or incommoded in the lawful exercise thereof.

- 2. Disturbance of common is where any cattle upon a common, and thereby robs the cattle of those who are of their respective shares of the pasture. Or if one who has a right of common puts in cattle which are not commonable, as hogs and goats, or surcharges it by putting more cattle therein than the herbage will sustain, or the party is entitled
- 3. Disturbance of ways happens when a person, who has a right to a way over another's ground, by grant or prescription, is obstructed by enclosures, or other obstacles, or by ploughing across it, by which means he connot enjoy his right of way, or, at least, not in so commodious a manner as he might have
- 4. Disturbance of tenure was where there was a tenant at will of any lands and tenements, and a stranger, either by menaces or threats, or by unlawful distresses, or by fraud and circumvention, or other means, contrived to drive him away, or inveigled him to leave This the law construed to be a his tenancy. wrong and injury to the lord, and gave him a reparation in damages against the offender by a special action on the case. Hal. Anal. c. 40: 1. Roll. Abr. 108.
- 5. Disturbance of patronage is a hindrance or obstruction of a patron to present his clerk to a benefice, and is by far the most considerable of the whole.

DISTURBER. If a bishop refuse or negleet to examine and admit a patron's clerk, without good reason assigned, or notice given, he is styled a disturber by the law, and shall not have any title to present by lapse; for no man shall take advantage of his own wrong.

tit. Marriage and Divorce, (7th edit.)

There are many divorces mentioned in our books; as causa pracontractus; causa frigidatus ; causa consanguinitatis ; causa affinitatis; causa professionis, &c. But the usual divorces are only of two kinds, i. e. a mensa et there from bed and board; and à vinculo matrimonii, from the very bond of marriage. A divorce a mensa et thoro dissolveth not the marriage, for the cause of it is subsequent to the marriage, and supposes the marriage to be vinculo matrimonii; and therefore, in the lawful; this divorce may be by reason of adultery in either of the parties, for cruelty of the husband, &c. But in these divorces, the wife, it is said, shall receive all again that she brought with her, because the nullity of the marriage arises through some impediment; and the goods of the wife were given for her advancement in marriage, which now ceaseth; but this is where the goods are not spent; and if the husband give them away during the coverture, without any collusion, it shall bind her; if she knows her goods unspent, she may bring action of detinue for them; known, she must sue in the spiritual court. The addition of day to this Dome-book was not meant with any allusion to the final day of judgment, as most persons have conceived, but was to strengthen and confirm it, and signifieth the judicial decisive record or book of dooming judgment and justice. Hammond's Annat'. Camden calls this book Gulielmi Librum Censualem, the Tax-book of King William, and it was further called Magna Rolla Winton. See the printed copy of Domesday-book, p. 332. (b.) There is an ancient roll in Ches. ter Castle called Domesday-roll. Blount. At York, Worcester, and other cathedrals, their registers or chartularies are called Domesdaybooks. A transcript of the Domesday-book of William I. has been made, and printed, by which it has been rendered more familiar to our antiquaries and historians. See Spelm in verb. DONATIO CAUSA MORTIS. A gift in prospect of death; a death-bed disposition; viz. when a person in his last sickness, apprehending his dissolution near, delivers or causes to be delivered to another, the possession of any personal goods, to be kept in case of his decease. To constitute a donatio mortis causa the transaction must first possess the requisites of a gift of a chattel, to which, when made by parol delivery is essential to pass the property in it from the donor to the donce. 2 B. & A. 551. There must be a delivery of possession to the donee, or to a third person in trust for him; which possession must continue uninterrupted to the time of the donor's death. 2 Marsh. 532: 7 Taunt. 224.

In this respect our law differs from the civil law, which did not require delivery.

The civil law admitted donations mortis causa for other reasons than the fear of approaching death; as where a man about to set forth on a long journey or voyage, and contemplating the perils of the way, was desirous of making a conditional gift of his property, to take effect in favour of some relative or friend in case he died, but to be resumed should be escape the threatened danger. But the law of this country recognises no other cause than the apprehension of death; and the donatio mortis causa must be made in the last illness of the donor. 1 Ves. Jun. 546. For if the gift be without reference to death, it is an absolute gift. 2 Ves. 111. And the reference to death must be either by words of the donor, or from the circumstances under which he makes the gift, as where he is in extremis. 2 Swanst. 92.

Also by the civil law any kind of property might be the subject of a donatio mortis causā; as, a farm, a house, a slave, a horse, or other chattel, bond for money, &c. But the law of England restricts such donations to personalty. Choses in action (with the exceptions hereinaster noticed) cannot be the subject of a donatio mortis causā. As for instance, a note (not being a cash note, or payable to bearer), 3 P. W. 356; or receipts for South Sea annuities. Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. 431. It has been held, however, that there may be a donatio mortis causā of a bond, 3 Atk. 214: 3 Madd. 184; and of a mortgage. 1 Bligh, N. S. 527.

There are several other points on which the civil law differs from the law of this country. By the former a donatio mortis causá might be made either in writing or by parol; by the latter it can only be made by parol. By the former five witnesses were requisite to establish the validity of such a gift; by the latter no particular number is required. By the former the gift was considered in the nature of a legacy; but by the latter it need not be proved in the ecclesiastical courts. 1 P. W.

In some particulars the civil law and the law of England agree. Both permit a wife to receive a donatio mortis causa from her husband. By both the gift may be recalled should the donor repent; is revoked by the death of the donee before the donor; and is liable to the debts of the latter.

DONATIVE, donativum.] Is a benefice merely given and disposed of by the patron to a man, without either presentation to, or institution by, the ordinary, or induction by his order. F. N. B. 35. Donatives are so termed, because they began only by the foundation and erection of the donor. The king might of ancient time found a church or chapel, and exempt it from the jurisdiction of the ordinary; so he may by his letters patent give license to a common person to found such church or chapel, and make it donative, not presentable; and that the incumbent or chaplain shall be deprived by the founder and his heirs, and not by the bishop; which seems to be the original of donatives in England. See 2 Comm. 22. and this Dict. tit. Advowson.

In the case of a donative the party is in full possession immediately on the nomination, and may maintain an action for money had and received against any person who receives the profits. 1 Term. Rep. K. B. 403.

When the king founds a church, &c. donative, it is of course exempted from the ordinary's jurisdiction, though no particular exemption is mentioned; and the Lord Chancellor shall visit the same; and where the king grants a license to any common person to found a church or chapel, it may be donative, and exempted from the jurisdiction of the bishop so as to be visited by the founder, &c. Co. Lit. 134: 2 Roll. Abr. 230. The resignation of a donative must be to the donor or fore it seems if donatives are taken last they patron, and not to the ordinary; and donatives are not only free from all ordinary jurisdic. Also the patron of which were originally laid on alienations; by a donative may take the profits thereof when it is vacant. Co. Lit. 344: Cro. Jac. 63.

If the patron of a donative will not nominate a clerk, there can be no lapse, but the bishop may compel such patron to nominate a clerk by ecclesiastical censures; for, though the church is exempt from the power of the ordinary, the patron is not exempted; and the clerk must be qualified like unto other clerks of churches, no person being capable of a donative, unless he be a priest lawfully ordained, &c. Yelv. 61: Stat. 14 Car. 2. c. 4: 1 Lill. 488.

There may be a donative of the king's gift with cure of souls, as the church of the Tower of London is; and if such donative be procured for money, it will be within the statute lay for a widow, where it was found by office of simony. I. Of the several Kinds of Dower.—There were formerly five kinds of dower in this kingdom:—1. Dower by the common law; which is a third part of such lands or tenements whereof the husband was sole seised in fee simple, or fee tail, during the coverture; and this the widow is to enjoy during her life.

2. Dower by custom; which is that part of the husband's estate to which the widow is entitled after the death of her husband, by the custom of any manor or place, so long as she lives sole and chaste; and this is more than one-third part, for in some places she shall have half the land, as by the custom of gavelkind; and in divers manors the widow shall have the whole during her life, which is called her free bench; but as custom may enlarge, so it may abridge dower to a fourth part. But it was not necessary that they should result from one entire limitation, or that there should have been a unity of title as to the freehold and inheritance. By whatever means they met so as to become absolutely consolidated, the attachment of a title of dower was the consequence. Park on Dower, 56. But the interposition of any vested estate, not being a chattel interest, between the limitation to the husband for life and the remainder to his heirs, during the continuance of that estate, prevented dower attach-Duncomb v. Duncomb, 3 Lev. 437. The decision in that case suggested to Mr. Fearne a form of limitation on the purchase of lands by which dower would be excluded, and which was very generally adopted in practice, and was known by the name of dower uses.

It had also long been settled, that although a husband might be tenant by the curtesy, a wife was not dowable of a trust estate of ined for this anomaly, that a wife was not endowed of a use previous to the 27 H. 8. c. 10., and that a trust in equity was the same as a use at common law. 3 P. W. 234. And as a necessary consequence of this doctrine, it was held that dower did not attach upon an equity of redemption, where the husband had mortgaged in fee previous to his marriage. 1 Bro. C. C. 326.

But now, by the 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 105. § 2. beneficially entitled to any land (which words by § 1. extends to manors, advowsons, messuages, and all other hereditaments, whether corporeal or incorporeal, except such as are not liable to dower), "for an interest which shall not entitle his widow to dower out of the same at law, and such interest, whether wholly equitable, or partly legal and partly equitable, shall be an estate of inheritance in possession, or equal to an estate of inheritance in possession (other than an estate in jointtenancy), then his widow shall be entitled in equity to dower out of the same land."

Likewise prior to the act it was requisite that a husband should be seised either in deed or in law, to entitle his wife to dower, for if he had merely a right of entry or of action to lands and died before he had recovered possession, dower did not attach.

This had been altered by § 3. which enacts that "when a husband shall have been entitled to a right of entry or action in any land, and his widow would be entitled to dower out of the same if he had recovered possession thereof, she shall be entitled to dower out of that such dower be sued for or obtained with- to marry afresh if she chose to live without a

And consequently where such a custom exists, the estate she is to take must, both as to its quantity and duration, be such as the custom prescribes. In some manors the widow shall have the whole lands of which her husband died seised, and in others only a portion, as a moiety, or a third, or a fourth part. Free-bench differs from dower in common law, in that the former, unless the particular custom declares it to be otherwise, does not attach even in right till the actual decease of the husband. 2 Ves. 633: 2 Atk. 526: 2 T. R. 580. Therefore any alienation by him alone to take effect in his life-time, though without any concurrence of the wife, whether it be by surrender in court (Carth. 275: 12 Mod. 49), by forfeiture, (1 Freem. 516. ca. 692), or in consequence of enfranchisement (Cro. Jac. 126), will effectually bar heritance. It was one of the reasons assign- her claim. Another important difference between free-bench and dower is, that the latter arises only out of an estate of inheritance; whereas by the custom of many manors, the widow of a copyholder for life is entitled to the whole estate for her free-bench. 1 Lev. 20. See further Watkyn's on Copyholds, vol. 2. 68.

III. Of the Assignment and Admeasurement of Dower .- By the old law grounded on the feodal exactions, a woman could not be endowed without a fine paid to the lord: neither could she marry again without his licence, lest she should contract herself, and so convey part of the feud, to the lord's enemy. Mirr. c. 1. § 3. This licence the lord took care to be well paid for; and as it seems, would sometimes force the dowager to a second marriage in order to gain the fine. But, to remedy these oppressions, it was provided, first by the famous charter of Henry I. A. D. 1101, and afterwards by Magna Charthe same although her husband shall not ta, c. 7. that the widow should pay nothing for have recovered possession thereof; provided her marriage, nor should she be "distrained" against the consent of the lord: and, further, that nothing should be taken for assignment of the widow's dower, but that she should remain in her husband's capital mansion-house for forty days after his death, during which time her dower should be assigned. These forty days are called the widow's quarantine, a term made use of in law to signify the number of forty days, whether applied to this occasion or any other. The particular lands to be held in dower must be assigned by the heir of the husband, or his guardian; Co. Lit. 34. 5; not only for the sake of notoriety, but also to entitle the lord of the fee to demand his services of the heir in respect of the lands so holden. For the heir, by this entry, becomes tenant thereof to the lord, and the widow is immediate tenant to the heir, by a kind of sub-infeudation, or under-tenancy, completed by this investiture or assignment; which tenure may still be created, notwithstanding the statute of quia emptores, because the heir parts not with the fee simple, but only with an estate for life. If the heir or his guardian do not assign her dower within the time of quarantine, or do assign it unfairly, she has her remedy at law, and the sheriff is appointed to assign

If a woman takes a lease for life of her husband's lands after his death, she shall have no dower, because she cannot demand it against herself; and if she takes a lease for years only, yet she shall not sue to have dower during these years, because it was her own act to suspend the fruit and effect of her dower during that time. Perk. 350: F. N. B.

If a recovery be had against the husband by collusion, this shall not bar the wife of dower, as if the recovery be by confession, or reddition, which are always understood to be by collusion, the husband always acting and concurring in obtaining of them; but it seems to have been a very great doubt, whether a recovery by default should not be a bar: and the better opinion being that such re-covery was a bar at common law, therefore the stat. W. 2. c. 4. was made, which ordains that notwithstanding such recovery by default, &c. pleaded, the tenant shall moreover in bar of the dower show his right to the tenements recovered; and if it be found that he had no right, then shall the demandant recover her dower notwithstanding such recovery by default against her husband. 2 Inst. 349: Perk. 376.

One method of barring dower is by jointures, as regulated by the stat. 27 H. 8. c. 10.

A jointure, which, strictly speaking, signifies a joint-estate, limited to both husband and wife, but in common acceptation extends also to a sole estate, limited to the wife only, is thus defined by Coke, 1 Inst. 36: "A competent livelihood of freehold for the wife, of lands and tenements; to take effect, in profit or possession, presently after the death of the husband, for the life of the wife at least." This description is framed from the stat. 27 H. 8. c. 10. commonly called the Statute of law is subject to no tolls or taxes; and her's Uses. (See tit. Uses.)—Before the making of that statute the greatest part of the land in England was conveyed to uses; the property or possession of the soil being vested in one man, and the use and profits thereof in another, whose directions, with regard to the disposition thereof, the former was in conscience obliged to follow, and might be compelled by a court of equity to observe. Now, though a husband had the use of lands in absolute fee simple, yet the wife was not entitled to any dower therein, he not being seised thereof: wherefore it became usual, on marriage, to settle by express deed some special estate to the use of the husband and his wife for their is more, though dower be forfeited by the lives in joint-tenancy, or jointure, which settlement would be a provision for the wife in jointure remain unimpeached to the widow. case she survived her husband. At length the statute of uses ordained, that such as had the it the preference, as being more sure and safe use of lands should, to all intents and purpo- to the widow than even dower ad ostium ecses, be reputed and taken to be absolutely clesia, the most eligible species of any. seised and possessed of the soil itself. In Comm. 135, &cc. An additional advantage consequence of which legal seisin, all wives would have become dowable of such lands as were held to the use of their husbands, and also entitled at the same time to any special lands that might be settled in jointure, had not the same statute provided, that upon making such an estate in jointure to the wife before marriage, she should be for ever precluded from her dower. 4 Rep. 1, 2.

But in this case these four requisites must be punctually observed: 1. The jointure must take effect immediately on the death of the husband. 4 Co. 3. 2. It must be for the life of the wife herself at least, and not pur auter vie, or for any term of years, or other smaller estate. 3. It must be made to herself, and no other in trust for her. 1 Inst. 36. b. 4. It must be made in satisfaction of her whole dower, and not of any part, and must be so stated in the deed, either in express terms, or by reasonable or necessary construction of its language. 1 Inst. 36. b.: 4 Rep. 3: Ow. 33: Cro. Eliz. 128: Dy. 220: 2 Vent. 340: 1 Ch. Ca. 181.

was not capable of consenting to it during coverture. See tit. Jointure.

If, by any fraud, or accident, a jointure made before marriage proves to be on a bad title, and the jointress is evicted, or turned out of possession, she shall then (by the provisions of the same stat. 27 H. 8. c. 10.) have her dower pro tanto at the common law. 2 Comm. 138. c. 8: 1 Sim. & Stu. 620.

There are some advantages attending tenants in dower that do not extend to jointresses; and so, vice versa, jointresses are in some respects more privileged than tenants in dower. Tenant in dower by the old common is almost the only estate on which, when derived from the king's debtor, the king cannot distrain for his debt, if contracted during the coverture. Co. Lit. 31. a.: F. N. B. 150. But on the other hand a widow may enter at once, without any formal process, on her jointure land, as she also might have done on dower ad ostium ecclesiæ, which a jointure in many points resembles; and the resemblance was still greater, while that species of dower continued in its primitive state; whereas no small trouble, and a very tedious method of proceeding, is necessary to compel a legal assignment of dower. Co. Lit. 36. And, what 1 Inst. 37. Wherefore Coke very justly gives Comm. 135, &c. An additional advantage is, that a jointure is not forfeited by the adultery of the wife as dower; and Chancery will decree against the husband a performance of marriage articles, though he alleges and proves that the wife lives separate from him in adultery. Sidney v. Sidney, 3 P. Wms. 269, &c., and the notes to that case.

Besides the legal bar provided by the above statute, a woman may also be bound in equity by a provision by way of jointure, although it may not be attended with all the requisites which have been noticed. Bonds for the payment of sums of money, leasehold estates, or funded property, before marriage, settled on the wife or in trust for her, have been held to defeat her title to dower. Equity appears to consider any provision, however inadequate or precarious it may be, which an adult accepts previous to marriage in lieu of dower, a good equitable jointure. 3 Ves. 545: 4 Brown's C. Previous to the late statute, when a title to dower had once attached, a husband could not defeat it by any act of his, except by a fine, levied with proclamations; in which case if his widow neglected to make her claim within five years after his death, she was barred. Where a man wished to sell an estate of which his wife was dowable, it was necessary for him to obtain her concurrence in levying a fine, or suffering a recovery, in order to extinguish her right, unless there was an outstanding term in the property, which might be assigned to the purchaser; and which was held in equity to be a sufficient protection against her title to dower. 1 I. & W. 665.

A material alteration has, however, been made in the law in this as well as in other respects, by the 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 105. which enables a husband to bar his wife's dower, by disposing, either by deed or will, of the property out of which she is dowable, and to prevent her becoming entitled to dower out of any land he may purchase, by a declaration in the deed of conveyance.

The fourth section enacts, "That no widow shall be entitled to dower out of any land which shall have been absolutely disposed of by her husband in his life-time, or by his will."

§ 5. " All partial estates and interests, and all charges created by any disposition or will of a husband, and all debts, incumbrances, contracts, and engagements, to which his land shall be subject or liable, shall be valid and effectual as against the right of his widow to dower.'

§ 6. "A widow shall not be entitled to dower out of any land of her husband, when in the deed by which such land was conveyed to him, or by any deed executed by him, it shall be declared that his widow shall not be entitled to dower out of such land."

§ 7. "A widow shall not be entitled to dower out of any land of which her husband shall die wholly or partially intestate, when by the will of her husband, duly executed for the devise of freehold estates, he shall declare his intention that she shall not be entitled to dower out of such land or out of any of his land."

§ 8. "The right of a widow to dower shall be subject to any conditions, restrictions, or directions, which shall be declared by the will of her husband, duly executed as aforesaid."

By § 9. "Where a husband shall devise any land out of which his widow would be entitled to dower if the same were not so devised, or any estate or interest therein, to or for the benefit of his widow, such widow shall not be entitled to dower out of or in any land of her said husband, unless a contrary intention shall be declared by his will."

any of his land not liable to dower, shall defeat or prejudice her right to dower, unless a contrary intention shall be declared by his will."

The two latter sections set at rest a question that frequently arose, how far a wife was precluded, by a benefit given to her by the the will of her husband, from claiming dower out of lands devised by such will; for if the gift was inconsistent with the claim of dower, or if an intention could be gathered from the will that she should accept it in lieu of dower, she could not take both, but was put to her election. The cases upon this point were very numerous, and many of them hardly re-concileable with each other. Those who wish to refer to them will find them collected in Powell on Devises, by Jarman, 1 vol. 447-55; and Roper on Husband and Wife, by Jacob, § 11. "Nothing in this act contained shall prevent any court of equity from enforcing any covenant or agreement entered into by or on the part of any husband not to bar the right of his widow to dower out of his lands, or any of them."

§ 14. "This act shall not extend to the dower of any widow who shall have been or shall be married on or before the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four, and shall not give to any will, deed, contract, engagement, or charge executed, entered into, or created before the said first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty four, the effect of defeating or prejudicing any right to dower."

V. Of the Remedies for the Recovery of Dower.—As a dowress has no right of entry until her dower is assigned, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that she cannot enforce its assignment by a possessory action. Her only legal remedy is by a writ of dower, unde nihil habet, or by a writ of right of dower brought against the tenant of the freehold; but which latter writ is never resorted to, except in cases where the former cannot be adopted. Should she obtain judgment, dower is thereupon assigned her by the sheriff, and she may then proceed by ejectment to recover possession.

In case of deforcement of dower, by not assigning any dower to the widow within the time limited by law, she has her remedy by writ of dower unde nihil habet. F. N. B. 147. But if she be deforced of part only of her dower, she cannot then say that nihil habet; and therefore she may have recourse to another action by writ of right of dower; which part or the whole, and is (with regard to her or seisin to the woman by a clod, or by grass claim) of the same nature as the grand writ of right is with regard to claims in fee-simple. On the other hand, if the heir, (being within age) or his guardian assign her more than she ought to have, this may be remedied by a writ of admeasurement of dower. F. N. B. 16. 148: Finch. L. 314. Stat. Westm. 2, 13 Ed. 1. c. 7.

A wife may have her writ of dower against an heir, an alienee, a disseisor, &c., or against any one that has power to assign dower: if the lord enters on the land for an escheat, she may bring it against him; but to the king she must sue by petition. 9 Rep. 10: Ploud. 141: Dyer, 263: Co. This writ was brought against eight persons, feoffees of the husband after marriage; two confessed the action, and the other six pleaded to issue: here the demandant had judgment to recover the third part of two parts of the land, in eight parts to be divided; and after the issue being found for the demandant against the other six, she recovered against them the third part of the six parts of the same land as her dower. Dyer, 187: Co. Lit. 32.

Although courts of equity at first refused to interfere, except where a dowress laboured under some difficulty or impediment in prosecuting her rights at law, they have latterly assumed a jurisdiction in setting out dower, which has rendered the bringing of a writ of versed, because the jury did not find that the dower a matter of rare occurrence. whenever the title of the dowress has been disputed upon a bill in equity for a commission to set out dower, the plaintiff has been sent to try her right at law. 2 Bro. C. C. 631. 633: 2 Ves. Jun. 128.

In an action of dower the first process is summons to appear: and if the tenant or defendant neglects or does not cast an essoin, a grand cape lies to seize the lands, &c. stat. 31 Eliz. c. 3. every summons on the land is to be made fourteen days before the return of the writ, and proclamation made at the church door on a Sunday, or else no grand for the heir is not bound to assign this provicape to be awarded, but an alias and pluries summons till proclamation. But on the return of the writ of summons, the attorney for the tenant or defendant may enter with wife: but a demand in pais before good testithe filazer that the tenant appears and prays view, &c. Then passes in some cases a writ of view, whereby the sheriff is to show the tenant's land; upon the return whereof the tenant's attorney takes a declaration, and puts in a plea: the most general one is ne unques seizie, &c., viz. the husband was had not the land all the time since the death never seised of any estate whereof the wife of the ancestor, and therefore she shall recan be endowed. When issue is joined you proceed to trial as in other actions: upon the trial the jury are to give damages for the nity and recompense against the heir, it is mesne profits from the death of the husband his own folly. is a more general remedy, extending either to of the lands. The sheriff may give possession growing on the land, or by any beast thereon. 40 Ed. 3: Fitz. Dower, 48. See Impey's Sheriff.

In case there be any thing objected, precedent to the title of dower, such as an outstanding term of years, a widow may nevertheless recover her dower with a cesset executio during the term. 1 Nels. 684. 687: 1 Salk. 291. Judgment in dower is to recover a third part of lands and tenements by metes and bounds.

A writ of dower was not within any of the former statutes of limitations, and might be brought at any distance of time; but the 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 27. § 2. limits the period to twenty years after the right of the claimant first accrues.

Dower being a real action, no damages were recoverable at common law. They are, however, given by the stat. of Merton, c. 1; but that statute extends only to the writ of dower unde nihil habet, and not to the writ of right of dower, because they are intended as a compensation for the detention of the possession; and on writs of right, where the right itself is questionable, no damages are given, because no wrong is done till the right be determined. Also that statute extends only to lands whereof the husband died seised; and therefore judgment for the damages was rehusband died seised; for otherwise she shall have no damage. Where the husband aliens and takes back an estate for life, the wife shall recover dower, but no damages; because this dving seised was only of an estate of freehold, not of the inheritance; but if he makes a lease for years only, rendering rent, she shall recover a third part of the reversion, with a third part of the rents and damages, because there he dies seised as the statute speaks. Lit. Co. 32. b.: Dyer, 284. pl. 33: Yelv. 112: Doctor & Stud. lib. 2. c. 13. § 166: 2 Inst. 80.

Damages must be after demand of dower, sion till demanded, because the law casts the freehold of the whole upon him, which he cannot divide without the concurrence of the mony is sufficient; and if the heir appear the first day on summons, and plead that he hath always been ready, and still is, to render her dower, she may plead such request and issue may be taken upon it: but the feoffee of the heir cannot plead tout temps prist, because he cover the mesne profits and damages against him; and if he hath not provided his indem-

DURESS, durities, constraint.] Whatever is done by a man to save either life or limb is looked upon as done by the highest necessity and compulsion. Therefore, if a man, through fear of death or mayhem, is prevailed upon to execute a deed, or do any other legal act, these, though accompanied with all other requisite solemnities, may be afterwards avoided, if forced upon him by a well-grounded apprehension of losing his life, or even his avoid the deed. 2 Danv. Abr. 686. If a perlimbs, in case of non-compliance. 2 Inst. 483. And the same is also a sufficient excuse for the commission of many misdemeanors. The constraint a man is under in these cirthere are two sorts, duress of imprisonment, where a man actually loses his liberty; and duress per minas (by threats), where the hardship is only threatened and impending.

If a man is under duress of imprisonment or illegal restraint of liberty, until he seals a bond or the like, he may allege this duress, and avoid the extorted bond. But if a man be lawfully imprisoned, and either to procure his discharge, or on any other fair account, seals a bond or deed, this is not by duress of imprisonment, and he is not at liberty to avoid Duress per minas, is either for fear of loss of life, or else for fear of mayhem or loss of limb. And this fear must be upon sufficient reason: non suspicio cujuslibet vani et meticulosi hominis, sed talis qui possit cadere in virum constantem. Bract. 1. 2. c. 5. A fear of battery (or being beaten) though never so well grounded, is no duress; neither is the fear of having one's house burned, or one's goods taken away and destroyed; because in these cases, should the threat be performed, a man may have satisfaction by recovering equivalent damages; but no suitable atonement can be made for the loss of life or limb. 2 Inst. 483. See 1 Comm. 131-6.

As to criminal cases.-In time of war or rebellion a man may be justified in doing many treasonable acts by compulsion of the enemy or rebels, which would admit of no excuse in time of peace. 1 Hal. P. C. 50. This, however, seems only, or at least principally, to hold as to positive crimes, so created by the laws of society, and which, therefore, society may excuse, but not as to natural offences so declared by the laws of God. It would therefore be incongruous for the king to send his writ to direct the judge of another's court in what manner to administer justice between the suitors. But when the privileges of these counties palatine were abridged by stat. 27 H. 8. c. 24. it was also enacted, that all writs and process should be made in the king's name, but should be tested or witnessed in the name of the owner of the franchise. The Formation and History of the Company, down to the passing of the 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 85 .- The first association for trading between England and India was formed in London in 1599. Its capital was divided into 101 shares, and amounted to 30,000l. On the 31st of December in the following year it procured a charter of privileges, to last for fifteen years, constituting the adventurers a body politic and corporate, by the name of "The Governor and Company of Merchants of London trading to the East Indies." The proprietors, thus incorporated, appointed a committee of twenty-four of their number, and a chairman, who were to be chosen annually for the management of their affairs. In the prosecution of their object five ships were provided, which sailed from Torbay on the 2d of May, 1601, with cargoes of bullion and merchandize; the total expense of their equipment and lading amounted to 75,000%. The difference between the sum and the amount brought forward by the original subscribers was furnished by persons who adventured their money upon the result of this one voyage, so that the trading of the Company was conducted on the term of a regulated, rather than a joint-stock company.

In 1609 the Company obtained a renewal of its charter for an indefinite period, subject, however to its being dissolved by government upon three years' notice being given. About two years after this time, permission was granted to the Company to establish factories at Surat, Ahmedabad, Cambaya, and Goga, upon its agreeing to pay a duty of 3½ per cent. upon all shipments of merchandize.

The system of subscriptions in order to provide the funds needed for the prosecution of each voyage, was discontinued in 1612, when the association assumed the character of a joint-stock Company. Capital was now raised amounting to 429,000l., which was embarked in four separate adventures or voyages, prosecuted in as many successive years. Although the result of these adventures was not equally profitable with those previously prosecuted by individuals under the regulation of the directors, the advantages derived (87½ per cent.) were sufficiently encouraging to produce a second set of subscriptions; and in the year 1617-18, a new

In 1636, a license to trade with India was granted by the king to a body of adventurers wholly distinct from the existing corporation, of the marriage portion of the Princess Catheof whose rights this was deemed to be an in- rine, was granted by the king to the Company vasion. The utmost efforts of the directors "in free and common soccage, as of the manor were unavailing, however, to procure the of East Greenwich, at an annual rent of 10t. recal of the license thus granted, until 1640, in gold, on the 30th of Sept. in each year." when, upon the promise of its annulment, the corporation was required to raise a new joint the Company, under which it was required to stock, in order to carry on the trade upon augment its capital stock, then 756,000l. to sufficiently extensive scale.

It was probably owing to the competition between the Company and its licensed rivals, that the profits on its transactions had fallen so low as to hold out poor inducements to any new adventurers; and accordingly we find that the whole sum subscribed to its fourth joint-stock fund amounted to no more than 22,500l.; and the efforts of the directors were consequently feeble and unproductive. Three years after this the subscription was advanced to the still inadequate sum of 105,000l.

It may have been the political troubles of that period which prevented the engagement to withdraw the license of the rival Company from being fulfilled. Both associations seem, ceedings threatened the old Company with however, to have become aware of the disadvantages resulting from competition, so that in 1650, their interests were joined, and new subscriptions obtained, under the denomination of "the United Joint Stock."

In 1693 the king granted a new charter to 1,500,000l., and to export in every year British produce to the value of 100,000l. This charter was to have had effect for twenty-one years, but the power of the Crown to grant such exclusive privileges was questioned by the Commons, who passed a resolution declaring "that it is the right of all Englishmen to trade to the East Indies, or any part of the world, unless prohibited by act of parliament."

Under the sanction of the declaration of the House of Commons, to which no reply was attempted on the part of the crown, many new adventurers began to trade with India, and a powerful opposition was raised up by an association of merchants, whose prodestruction. With the view of retrieving their affairs, the directors took advantage of the necessities of the government, and offered to lend the sum of 700,000l. at 4 per cent. interest, on condition that their charter should The first of those peculiar privileges to be confirmed, and the exclusive right of which must be ascribed the growth of the trading with India secured to the original being subjected to the payment of any duties. be invested with the monopoly, and allowed The management of the Company's affairs to manage their capital, whether as a joint-

The rivalship of these two Companies was productive of much inconvenience both com- Companies had shown much anxiety respectmercial and political, so that in the beginning ing the claim which government might make of 1701, when the three years' notice to the old Company was about expiring, an union was effected between them. Seven years were allowed during which each association was to manage separately the stocks actually engaged, and to wind up its affairs, after which the union was to be complete and final. When this period arrived an act (6 Anne, c. 17.) was passed, obliging the United Company to advance to government the sum of 1,200,000l. without interest, which, when added to the former loan of 2,000,000l. at 8 per cent., raised the amount to 3,200,000l. and reduced the rate of interest to 5 per cent. upon the whole advance. In return for this stipulation, the Company was empowered to raise 1,500,000l. either on its common seal, or by contributions from its members, and to add the 1,200,000 to its capital stock. In 1767 an agreement was entered into between the public and the United Company to the effect, that in consideration of an annual payment of 400,000l. the territory should remain in the possession years more from the 1st of February, 1769. The sums paid to the public by the Company under these two acts amounted to 2,169,398i. 18s. 2d.

The revenues of the Company in India proving inadequate to defray the expenses of its government, and the large annual payment reserved to the public, a petition was presented to parliament in 1773, praying relief: in consequence, the sum of 1,400,0001. was lent to the Company for four years.

Parliament availed itself of this occasion to assume a general regulation of the Company's affairs, and to effect a complete change in its constitution. It appointed a governorgeneral to reside in Bengal, to which station the other Indian presidencies were made subordinate. A supreme court of judicature was likewise established in Calcutta, with judges cent, foregoing the annual payment of 400,000l. until the debt, incurred under the This act of parliament was the foundation arrangement, should be discharged. In return for these exactions, parliament, besides advancing the sum above-mentioned, and foregoing for a time the annual payment of 400,000L, confirmed to the Company its territorial possessions until the expiration of its then existing charter.

The act passed in 1781, for renewing the charter until March, 1794, continued the territorial acquisitions and revenues in the Company for a period terminating upon three years' notice, to be given after March, 1791. By § 15. the same commissioners are, upon the requisition of the Court of Directors, to raise money in the manner therein mentioned, for payment of the Company's dividend, in case of failure, or delay in remitting the proper funds for that purpose.

By § 16. the dividends of the security fund, after it shall amount to 12,000,000l., and until it shall be applied in redemption of the Company's dividend, and also so much of the fund as shall remain after such redemption, are to be applied in aid of the revenues of the territories.

By § 17. the dividend of the Company's capital stock is to be paid out of the revenues transmitted to Great Britain, in preference to all other charges; and the said sum of 2,000,000l. is, after the 22d of April, 1832, to have priority of payment out of any sums due from the public, and any government stock then belonging to the Company subject to such payments; the revenues and moneys then belonging to the Company, and all moneys to be received by them in respect of the property and rights vested in them in trust, are to be applied to the service of the government of India, and in defraying the affairs of the Company, subject to the supercharges created by the act.

III. The Home Government of India .-The home government of India is formed of-1. The Court of Proprietors; 2. The Court of Directors; 3. The Commissioners for the affairs of India, commonly called the Board of Control.

1. The Court of Proprietors is composed of all the members of the Company who are possessed of a certain amount of stock. Previous to the 13 G. 3. c. 63. the holder of 500l. stock was entitled to a vote, but by § 3 of that statute, the qualification for a single vote is raised to 1000l. stock. By § 4. the possessor of 3000l. stock is privileged to give two votes at any election of directors, or any ballot of the Company; of 6000l. three votes; of 10,000l. four votes; which is the greatest number allowed to any one member. By § 6. an oath or affirmation that he holds the stock in his own right, and has been possessed of it for twelve months, except in the cases therein mentioned, is required of every proprietor before he is permitted to vote.

By § 27. of the 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 85., any proprietor resident in the United Kingdom, may vote by attorney on the election of directors, making an affidavit or affirmation before a justice of the peace to the like effect as the oath or affirmation taken by proprietors voting upon ballots at any general court.

The proprietors elect the directors, and formerly declared the dividends. They may make bye-laws which were binding where no act of parliament existed to the contrary. Proceedings in parliament affecting the interests of the Company, and all gratuities to any civil or military officer exceeding 600l. must have their sanction, as well as the confirmation of the Board of Control. They have not, however, any generally controlling power over the Court of Directors, neither can they (24 G. 3. c. 25. § 29.) revoke or rescind any of its orders after they have been approved by the Board of Control. The number of proprietors recently entitled to vote were 1956; of whom 54 possessed four votes, 50 three votes, 370 two votes, and 1502

2. The Court of Directors consists of twenty-four proprietors, who manage the intendence of the Board of Control. They are chosen at a general Court of Proprietors, held annually on the second Wednesday in April (17 G. 3. c. 8), and each must possess a qualification of 2000l. stock. Formerly they were elected in a body for one year only, but under the provisions of the 13 G. 3. c. 63 § 1. they now hold their offices for four years, six going out annually by rotation. After the expiration of a year, they are again eligible and are generally re-chosen; thirteen from a court. The appointment of a chairman and deputy chairman rests with the directors, and takes place once a year, By § 27. of the 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 85. so much of the 13 G. 3. c. 63. as restricted any person who had been employed, either in a civil or a military capacity in India, from being chosen a director until he had resided two years in England, is repealed, except in the cases therein mentioned.

The meetings of the Court of Directors are to be held at least once a week, but frequently take place at a shorter interval, being summoned as occasion requires. For the dispatch By the charter granted under the authority of business, the court divides itself into rectors, the matter should be determined by 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 85. § 35. the Court of Directors. But by § 77. of the 53 G. 3. c. 155. no tors are from time to time to appoint a secret committee, to consist of any number of directors not exceeding three, for the purposes specified in the statute, who, before they act, are to administer to each other and take the oath therein mentioned.

3. The Board of Control was first established by Mr. Pitt's celebrated India; Bill (24 G. 3. sess. 2. c. 25.) By that act the king was authorized to appoint six commissioners for the affairs of India from among his privy councillors; of whom, one of the secretaries of state, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being, were to be two; three commissioners to form a board, whereof the said secretary of state, or, in his absence, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or, in the absence of both, the senior commissioner was to be president, who, in case of the board ceeding of all courts of proprietors, or courts being at any time equally divided in opi- of directors, within eight days after such nion, was to have two voices, or the casting | courts are held, and also copies of all material

The laws punishing mutiny or desertion of officers or soldiers in the service of the Company were consolidated and amended by the 4 G. 4. c. 81. which prescribes the manner in which court-martials are to be holden for the trial of offenders.

By 3 and W. 4 c. 85. § 72. for the purposes of the above act, the presidency of Fort William in Bengal is to be deemed entire, and not divided into two presidencies.

By § 73. the governor-general in council may from time to time make articles of war for the government of the native officers and soldiers in the military service of the Company, and for the administration of justice by courtmartial to be holden on such officers and soldiers.

V. The Administration of Justice.—There exists in India two concurrent, and in some instances conflicting, systems of judicature; the Company's courts, and the king's or supreme courts.

In the Company's courts there are three grades of European judges-the district, the provisional, and the judges of the Sudder court. There are also two classes of native judges; Moorsifs, of whom several are stationed in every district-and Sudder ameens, established at the same stations with the European district judges. There are also magistrates, who exercise civil jurisdiction; and registrars, who decide such cases as may be referred to them by the judges.

By a charter granted to the Company, being dated the 8th January, 26 G. 2. courts of civil, criminal, and ecclesiastical jurisdiction were established at Madras, Bombay, and Fort powered by charter or letters patent to erect a supreme court of judicature at Fort William, to consist of a chief justice and three other judges (reduced by 37 G. 3. c. 140. to two), being barristers of five years' standing, which court was to exercise all civil, criminal, admiralty, and ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and be a court of record, over and terminer, and gaol delivery, for the town of Calcutta and factory of Fort William, and the factories subordinate thereto.

By § 14. the court is to have jurisdiction ever all British subjects residing in the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, for the trial of any criminal offences committed against his Majesty's subjects, or of any civil action instituted against them, or any person who, at the time the cause of action arose, was in the service of the Company, or of his Majesty's subjects.

By § 15. the court shall not be competent to try any indictment against the governor-general, or any of his council, for any offence (not' being treason or felony) committed in Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa.

By § 16. the Supreme Court may determine actions by British subjects against any inhabitant of India residing in Bengal, Bahar, or Orissa, upon contracts in writing, where the cause of action exceeds the sum of 500 current rupees, and such inhabitant shall have agreed that in case of dispute the matter shall be heard by the Supreme Court; and such actions may be brought before it either in the first instance, or by appeal from the courts established in those provinces.

By § 17. the governor-general, his council, judges are not to be arrested or imprisoned upon any action or proceeding in the court.

§ 18. gives an appeal from the Supreme Court to his Majesty in council.

By § 34. offences and misdemeanors in the Supreme Court are to be tried by a jury of British subjects resident in Calcutta.

By § 38. the governor-general and council at Fort William, as well as the judges of the Supreme Court, are empowered to act as justices of peace; and the governor-general and council are authorized to hold quarter sessions within the settlement of Fort William four times a-year; the same to be a court of re-

EJECTMENT.

Ejectment is, strictly speaking, an action at law, whereby a person ousted or amoved from an estate for years may recover possession thereof; but by means of a series of fictions it has long been used for trying disputed titles to corporcal hereditaments; and under the provisions of the 2 and 3 W. 4. c. 27. for the abolition of real and mixed actions, it will shortly be the only legal mode by which such titles can be determined.

N. B. 220. In this case he shall have his writ of ejection or ejectment, to call the defendant to answer for entering on the lands so demised to the plaintiff for a term that is not yet expired, and ejecting him. And by this writ the plaintiff shall recover back his term or the remainder of it, with

The writ of covenant, for breach of the had ejected his lessee, together with damages for the ouster. But if the lessee was ejected by a stranger claiming under a title superior to that of the lessor, or by a grantor of the reversion (who might at any time by a common recovery have destroyed the term), though the lessee might still maintain an action of by any means recover the term itself. F. N. B. 145. If the ouster was committed by a mere stranger, without any title to the land, the lessor might indeed, by a real action recover possession of the freehold, but the leseee had no other remedy against the ejector but in damages, by a writ of ejectione firmæ, for the trespass committed in ejecting him from his farm. But afterwards, when the courts of equity began to oblige the ejector to make a specific restitution of the land to the party immediately injured, the courts of law also adopted the same method of doing complete justice; and, in the prosecution of a writ of ejectment introduced a species of remedy warranted by the original writ, nor prayed by the declaration (which are calculated for damages merely, and are silent as to any restitution), viz. a judgment to recover the term, and a writ of possession thereupon. This method seems to have been settled as early as the reign of Edward IV., though it hath been said to have first begun under Henry VII., because it probably was then first applied to its present principal use, that of trying the title of the land. Bro. Ab. F. N. B. 220.

The better to apprehend the contrivance, whereby this end is effected, it is to be recollected that the remedy by ejectment is, in its original, an action brought by one who hath a lease for years, to repair the injury done him by dispossession. In order therefore to convert it into a method of trying titles to the freehold, it is first necessary that the claimant A writ of ejectione firma, or action of tres- do take possession of the lands, to empower him to constitute a lessee for years, that may be capable of receiving this injury of dispossession. For it would be an offence, called in our law maintenance, to convey a title to another, when the grantor is not in possession of the land: and indeed it was doubted at first, whether this occasional possession, taken merely for the purpose of conveying the title, excused the lessor from the legal guilt of maintenance. 1 Ch. Rep. Ap. 39.

When, therefore, a person, who hath a right of entry into lands, determines to ac-Since the disuse of real actions, this mixed quire that possession, which is wrongfully proceeding is become the common method of withheld by the present tenant, he makes (as

This lessee is one, who had no existence, as is frequently, to stay upon the land, till the prior tenant, or though unwarrantably practised. 6 Mod. 209. he who had the previous possession, enters It is also stated, that Smith, the lessee, enterthereon afresh and ousts him; or till some other person (either by accident or by agreement beforehand) comes upon the land and turns him out or ejects him. For this injury the lessee is entitled to his action of ejectment against the tenant; or his casual ejector, sual ejector, or defendant, sends a written nowhichever it was that ousted him, to recover tice to the tenant in possession of the lands, back his term and damages. But where this e. g. George Saunders, informing him of the action is brought against such a casual ejector; action brought by Smith, and transmitting as is before mentioned, and not against the him a copy of the declaration; withal assurvery tenant in possession, the court will not ing him that he, Stiles, the defendant, has no suffer the tenant to lose his possession without title at all to the premises, and shall make no an opportunity to defend it. Wherefore it is defence; and therefore advising the tenant to a standing rule, that no plaintiff shall proceed in ejectment to recover lands against a casual ejector without notice given to the tenant in, possession (if any there be), and making him | the actual tenant, Saunders, will inevitably be a defendant if he pleases. And, in order to turned out of possession. On receipt of this maintain the action, the plaintiff must, in case of any defence, make out four points before the court; viz. title, lease, entry, and ouster. First, he must show a good title in his lessor, which brings the matter of right entirely before the court; then, that the lessor, being ejector, Saunders, the real tenant, will be seised or possessed by virtue of such title, did turned out of possession by the sheriff. make him the lease for the present term: thirdly, that he, the lessee, or plaintiff, did enter or take possession in consequence of such lease; and then, lastly, that the defendant to contess, at the trial of the cause, three of custed, or ejected him. Whereupon he shall the four requisites for the maintenance of the have judgment to recover his term and damages; and shall, in consequence, have a writ of possession, which the sheriff is to execute by delivering him the undisturbed and peaceable | defendant instead of Stiles: which requisites possession of his term.

This is the regular method of bringing an action of ejectment, in which the title of the lessor comes collaterally and incidentally before the court, in order to show the injury done to the lessee by this ouster. This method must be still continued in due form and strictness (save only as to the notice to the tenant), whenever the possession is vacant, or there is no actual occupant of the premises; and also in some other cases. But, as much trouble and formality were found to attend the actual making of the lease, entry, and ouster, a new and more easy method of trying titles by writ of ejectment, where there is any actual tenant or occupier of the premises in dispute, was invented by the lord chief justice Rolle. Styl. Pract. Reg. 108. (edit. 1657.)

This new method entirely depends upon a string of legal fictions; no actual lease is made, no actual entry by the plaintiff, no actual ouster by the defendant, but all are merely ideal, for the sole purpose of trying the title. lord or tenant, or both, after entering into the To this end, in the proceedings, a lease for a common rule, fail to appear at the trial and to term of years is stated to have been made, by confess lease, entry, and ouster, the plaintiff

ed, and that the defendant William Stiles, who is called the casual ejector, ousted him; for which ouster he brings this action. As soon as this action is brought, and the complaint fully stated in the declaration, Stiles, the caappear in court and defend his own title; otherwise he, the casual ejector, will suffer judgment to be had against him, and thereby caution, if the tenant in possession does not, within a limited time, apply to the court to be admitted a defendant in the stead of Stiles, he is supposed to have no right at all; and, upon judgment being had against Stiles, the casual

But if the tenant in possession applies to be made a defendant, it is allowed him upon this condition; that he enter into a rule of court, plaintiff's action; viz. the lease of Rogers the lessor, the entry of Smith, the plaintiff, and his ouster by Saunders himself, now made the being wholly fictitious, should the defendant put the plaintiff to prove them, he must of course be nonsuited for want of evidence; but by such stipulated confession of lease, entry, and ouster, the trial will now stand upon the

This done, the declaration is altered by inserting the name of George Saunders (the tenant) instead of William Stiles; and the cause goes down to trial under the name of Smith (the plaintiff) on the demise of Rogers (the lessor) against Saunders, the now defendant. And herein the lessor of the plaintiff is bound to make out a clear title, otherwise his fictitious lessee cannot obtain judgment to have posses. sion of the land for the term supposed to be granted. But if the lessor makes out his title in a satisfactory manner, then judgment and a writ of possession shall go for Smith, the nominal plaintiff, who, by his trial, has proved the right of Rogers, his supposed lessor.

But if the new defendants, whether land-

Smith must indeed be there nonsuited for want of proving those requisites: but judgment will in the end be entered against the casual ejector, Stiles; for the condition on which Saunders (the tenant), or his landlord, was admitted a defendant, is broken, and therefore the plaintiff is put again in the same situation as if he never had appeared at all; the consequence of which (we have seen) would have been, that judgment would have been entered for the plaintiff, and the sheriff, by virtue of a writ for that purpose, would have turned out the tenant Saunders, and delivered possession to Smith, the plaintiff. The same process, therefore, as would have been had, provided no conditional rule had ever been made, must now be pursued as soon as the condition is broken.

The damages recovered in these actions, though formerly their only intent, are now usually (since the title has been considered as the principal question) merely nominal, as Is. In order, therefore, to complete the remedy, when the possession has been long detained from him that had the right to it, an action of trespass also lies, after a recovery in ejectment, to recover the mesne profits which the tenant in possession has wrongfully received. Which action may be brought in the name of either the nominal plaintiff in the ejectment, or his lessor, against the tenant in possession: whether he be made party to the ejectment, or suffers judgment to go by default. In this case, the judgment in ejectment is conclusive evidence against the defendant, for all profits which have accrued since the date of the demise stated in the former declaration of the plaintiff; but if the plaintiff sues for any antecedent profits, the defendant may make a new defence. 4 Burr. 668.

Such is the modern way of obliquely bring. ing in question the title to lands and tenements, in order to try it in this collateral manner; a method which is now universally adopted in almost every case. It is founded on the same principles as the ancient writ of assize, being calculated to try the mere possessory title to an estate; and hath succeeded to those real actions, as being infinitely more convenient for attaining the ends of justice; because the form of the proceeding being entirely fictitious, it is wholly in the power of the court to direct the application of that fiction, so as to prevent fraud and chicane, and eviscerate the very truth of the title. writ of ejectment and its nominal parties (as was resolved by all the judges) are judicially to be considered as the fictitious form of an action, really brought by the lessor of the plaintiff against the tenant in possession; invented, under the control and power of the court, for the advancement of justice in many respects; and to force the parties to go to trial on the merits, without being entangled in the nicety of pleadings on either side. 4 Burr. 668. See also 3 Burr. 1294, 6.

The practice reprobated by Blackstone of making an ideal person the plaintiff is now invariably adopted: and there is no longer any objection to it, as the lessor of the plaintiff, by the consent rule undertakes to pay the defendant's costs in case the plaintiff fails in the action. A party before he is let in to defend must now also specify in the consent rule for what premises he means to defend, and thereby agree to confess upon the trial, that he (if he defends as tenant, or, in case he defends as landlord, that his tenant) was at the time of the service of the declaration of the premises therein mentioned; should he not confess such possession, as well as lease, entry, and ouster, whereby the plaintiff cannot further prosecute his action, no costs are allowed to him, but he is compelled to pay costs to the plaintiff. Regula Generalis, K. B. 4 B. & A. 196. Like rule in C. P. 2 B. & B. 470: Exchequer, 9 Price, 299.

It has been already observed, that in the case of a vacant possession, the ancient practice of entering upon the premises, and making a lease thereof to a third person, must be pursued. As to what is a vacant possession, and the proceedings thereon, see Roscoe, 546.

II. For what things Ejectments will not lie.

—By the common law this action cannot be brought for any thing whereon an entry may not be made, or of which the sheriff cannot deliver possession.

Therefore an ejectment will not lie for an advowson, a rent, a common, or other incorporeal hereditaments which pass by grant; Brownl. 129: Cro. Car. 492: Str. 54; except for tithes in the hands of lay appropriators, by the express purview of stat 32 H. 8. c. 7. which doctrine has since been extended by analogy to tithes in the hand of the clergy. Cro. Car. 301: 2 Ld. Raym. 789.

III. For what things Ejectment will lie.— Ejectment in general lies only for corporeal hereditaments. The claimant must also have a right of entry at the time of the demise in the declaration. This right of entry or possession could formerly be barred in six different ways, viz. by a descent cast, by a discontinuance, by a fine levied with proclamations, by warranty, by a deforcement, and by the statute of limitations. 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. The four former bars have been abolished by the 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 27. §39. and 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 74. § 2. See tits. Discontinuance, Entry, Fine, and Warranty. The 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 27. has in many respects altered the 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. and will be shortly referred to under the next head.

The party claiming in ejectment must recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of that of the defendant; for the possession of the latter gives him a right against every one who cannot establish a good title in himself; and it is sufficient for such defendant if he can show the real title of the land to be out of the lessor of the plain-tiff. 4 Burr. 2487: 2 T. VI. Within what Time the Action must be brought.—The statute 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. § 1. enacted no person should make an entry upon lands but within twenty years next after his right or title descended or accrued. By § 2. infants, married women, persons non compos mentis, imprisoned, or beyond seas, at the time of the right or title to lands descended or accrued to them, were allowed ten years after the removal of their disabilities to bring their action, or make their entry, notwithstanding twenty years had expired. This act did not extend to ecclesiastical persons, and only operated in cases of adverse possessions.

By 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 27. § 2. no person (which word by § 1. extends to a body politic, corporate, or collegiate) shall bring an action to recover any land (which by § 1. extends to all corporeal hereditaments, and to any interest therein, whether of a freehold, copyhold, or chattel nature, and to all tithes, other than such as belong to a spiritual or eleemosynary corporation sole), but within twenty years next after his right, or the right of the person through whom he claims, accrued.

§ 3. fixes the time at which the right shall be deemed to have first accrued in the cases therein enumerated.

By § 16. if any person shall be under disability of infancy, coverture, idiotcy, lunacy, unsoundness of mind, or absence beyond seas, at the time when his right shall first accrue, he, or the person claiming through him, may, notwithstanding twenty years shall have expired make an entry or bring an action to recover land within ten years after the cessa-tion of any such disability, or the death of the party to whom the right first accrued.

By § 29. no lands are to be recovered by mosynary corporation sole, after two incumbencies and six years, or sixty years.

Previous to the above act non-payment of rent alone did not render the possession of a tenant adverse to his landlord; but by § 3. it is declared, among other things, that a right which will have the effect of making twenty is usual to enumerate the whole as lying in years' possession, without payment of rent, or any written acknowledgment of right in the landlord a bar to any ejectment, which stating them to be within the other; but it seems sufficient to describe them as lying in the latter may bring. Joint tenants and parceners may either join or sever in demising; 1 Show.: 1 Wils.; but tenants in common, not being seised per mie et per tout, must make several demises; 2 Wils. 232; but each demise may be alleged to be of the whole premises; for under a demise of the whole, an undivided moiety may be recovered. 1 Esp. 330.

When any doubt exists as to the party in whom the legal title is vested, or as to the day when such title accrued, it is usual to declare upon distinct demises by the persons concerned in interest, and to lay them on different days, according to the circumstances of the case. But if a party is made a lessor without his authority, he may, before appearance, move to have his name struck out of the declaration. 2. Chitty Rep. 171.

Entry and Ouster. The plaintiff is stated to enter upon the premises by virtue of the demise; and it is usual, though not necessary, to allege a day. Nor is it essential to mentain the day of the ouster, if it appear it took place after the commencement of the term and before action brought. Cro. Jac. 311: 4 Burr. 2447. The Christian and surname of the tenant in possession should be prefixed to the notice. 1 Chitty Rep. 573. Where there are several tenants, it is usual to prefix all their names to the notice; but it is sufficient to prefix the name of each to the notice accompanying the declaration with which he is served.

A notice directed to a wrong person, though served on the tenant in possession is not good.

When the premises are situate in London or Middlesex, the notice (in ordinary cases, not between landlord and tenant, but signed in the name of the casual ejector) should require the tenant to appear on the first day in full term, or within the first four days of the term, and not on the essoin day. 2 Strange,

In addition to what is there laid " declarations in ejectment may be served before the first day of any term, and thereupon the plaintiff shall be entitled to judgment against the casual ejector, in like manner as upon declarations served before the essoin, or first general return day."

The declaration must be served by delivering a copy of it, and the notice thereunder written, to the tenant in possession, or his Where there are several tenants in possession of different parts of the premises, and one of them appears and confesses lease, a copy must be served on each to entitle the lessee of the plaintiff to judgment against the casual ejector for the whole. 1 Chitty Rep. 141: 3 Moore, 578. And it would seem, that where a house is let out in lodgings a copy should be served on every lodger, 1 Tidd. 526. 8th ed.; but where several persons are in possession of the same premises as joint tenants, service on one is a sufficient service on all. 1 Chitty R. 141: 1 B. & P. 369: 3 Tyr. 84.

If the tenant keep out of the way to avoid being served, and neither he nor his wife can be met with, a copy of the declaration should be delivered to his child, relation or servant, or other person on the premises, and another copy should be affixed to the door, or some conspicuous part of the premises; and if it appear on affidavit of the facts that the tenant absconded to avoid being served, the court will grant a rule nisi, that such service shall be good, and direct how the rule shall be served. 2 Wils .: 2 Chitty Rep. 176, 177: Roscoe, 558.

Judgment against the casual ejector. The time for the defendant's appearance, and, in case of his default, the time for moving for judgment against the casual ejector, (which is a motion of course only requiring counsel's signature), are governed by the locality

Service of Declaration. It was formerly of the premises, and by the practice of the

Who may appear. Has already been condown with respect to landlord and tenant, it may be stated that the latter may appear alone, or jointly with the former.

In ejectment where there are divers defendants, and the freeholds are several, no defendant may defend for more than is in his own possession; and the plaintiff may take judgment against his ejector for what remains. 1 Vent. 355: 2 Keb. 524, 531.

If there be two defendants in ejectment, entry, and ouster, but the other does not appear, in that case the plaintiff may enter a non-pros, or retraxit, against him, and go to trial, and have judgment against the other defendant. 1 Lord Raym. 717, 718. Also if an ejectment be brought against two persons, and after issue joined one dies, and a venire is awarded as to the two defendants, and a verdict against two; here, upon suggestion of the death of one of them upon the roll, judgment shall be given for the plaintiff against the other for the whole: for it is said this action is grounded upon torts, which are several in their nature, and one may be found guilty and the other acquitted. Ibid.

The consent rule. Has also been already mentioned. Where a landlord is admitted to defend without the tenant, judgment must be assigned against the casual ejector according to the conditions of the consent rule. The reason for this practice is, to enable the claimant to obtain possession of the premises in case the verdict be in his favour; because, as the landlord is not in possession, no writ of possession could issue upon a judgment

The only case in which it is necessary to produce the consent rule at the trial is, when the plaintiff directs his proof to certain premises, and the other party contends he does not defend for such premises. 1 M. & M. 237; 2 B. & A. 948.

Of the plea and issue. The general issue in ejectment is not guilty, and is the only plea ever pleaded in modern practice; for under it, any thing showing the plaintiff has not a right to recover, as that he is barred by the statutes of limitation, may be given in evidence. Should, however, the circumstances of the case require it, the court will allow the defendant to plead specially. Carth. 180.

Of the trial. Should the defendant not appear on the trial, or refuse to confess lease, &c. pursuant to the consent rule, the practice is to call the plaintiff and nonsuit him; after which, at his instance, the cause of the nonsuit is indorsed on the postea, which entitles him to judgment against the casual ejector. 1 Salk. 259: 2 Tidd, 918. 8th edit.

But in ejectment by a landlord against a tenant on the statute 4. G. 4. c. 87. § 2. when many different ways. An ejectment howit appears the tenant or his attorney has had ever, though in its nature not final at law, due notice of trial, the plaintiff shall not be is capable of being made so in equity; nonsuited for default of the defendant's apand the Court of Chancery will, on proper pearance, or of confession of lease, &c., but the production of the consent rule shall be sufficient evidence of the lease, &c.; and the plaintiff is to be permitted, after proof of his right, to recover the whole or any part of the premises, to go into evidence of the mesne profits thereof from the determination or expiration of the tenant's interest therein down to the time of the verdict, or of some day therein mentioned; and the jury, finding for the plaintiff, may give their verdict both for the recovery of the whole or part of the pre-mises, and for the damages for such mesne

In case it appears to the judge that the finding is contrary to evidence, and the damages are excessive, he may order execution to be stayed till the fifth day of the following term, which order the judge shall in all other cases make on the requisition of the defendant, upon his undertaking to find and entering into such security as therein mentioned, not to commit, waste, or sell, or carry off, any standing crops, hay, &c. upon the premises, from the day of the verdict, to the day whereon the ejection shall be finally made on the judgment, or set aside.

Of the judgment. The judgment in ejectment is, that the plaintiff recover his term yet to come and unexpired in the lands demanded; and the effect of it is to give the lessor of the plaintiff possession of the lands, but not to invest him with any title thereto, except such as he previously had.

A new trial, may, upon proper grounds, be granted in ejectment as well as in other cases. 2 Str. 1105: 4 Burr. 2224.

If there be a verdict and judgment against the plaintiff, he may bring another ejectment for the land, the action being only to recover the possession, &c., wherein judgment is not final; and it is not like a writ of right, &c. where the title alone is tried. Wood's Inst. 547.: Trin. 23. Car. B. R.

And the verdict in an ejectment is not evidence in a subsequent action, even between the same parties. 1 Mod. 10.

The reason of an ejectment being never final is not laid down in the general books on this subject; but in the notes to Euro-mus, vol. iv. p. 189, it is thus ingeniously stated:-The reason why it is not or cannot be final, seems to be this,—that it is impossi-ble from the structure of the record in this action, to plead a former, in bar of another ejectment brought. Because 1. The plaintiff and defendant are nominal, and exist in most cases on record only, and, consequently, may be changed in a new action. But the identity both of plaintiff and defendant must be averred in pleading a former action in bar. 2. The term demised may be laid execution may be issued thereon for the costs, and the Court of Chancery will, on proper grounds, grant a perpetual injunction, and not permit the possession of lands to be disturbed by a vain incessant litigation of the same question. See 2 Eq. Ab. 171. c. 1; 243. c. 11; 222. c. 1.: Parl. Cases (8vo.), tit. Injunction, ca. 1. 3: 2 Stra. 404.

Of the execution. In real actions, where the freehold is recovered, the demandant has execution by the writ of habere facias seisinam; in ejectment, therefore, it is but just that a similar remedy shall be permitted to the plaintiff, who, as he now has judgment to recover the possession of the land, may put the sentence of the law in execution by virtue of a writ of habere facias possessionem, directing the sheriff to give actual possession to the plaintiff of the land recovered.

This writ may be sued out though the lessor of the plaintiff be dead, if tested the last day of the preceding term. 4 Burr. 1970. The legal relation to the day of the teste is proper to be supported in maintenance of a writ of possession on a judgment in eject-ment. Ibid.

By 1 W. 4. c. 70. § 38. in all cases of trials of ejectments at Nisi Prius, where a verdict shall be given for the plaintiff, or the plaintiff shall be nonsuited for want of the defendant's appearance to confess lease, &c., it shall be lawful for the judge before whom the cause shall be tried to certify his opinion on the back of the record, that a writ of possession ought to issue immediately, and upon such certificate a writ of possession may be issued forthwith, and the costs may be taxed, and judgment signed and executed afterwards, at the usual time, as if no writ had issued.

Formerly a pracipe was required in the King's Bench, but not in the Common Pleas; but now by one of the general rules, H. T. 2 W. 4. r. 76. a writ of habere facias possessionem may be sued out without lodging a præcipe with the officer of the court, and by

r. 75. it need not be signed.

Of the costs. If the action be undefended, and judgment is entered against the casual ejection, the only means the lessor of the plaintiff has of obtaining his costs is by an action for mesne profits, wherein they are recoverable as special damages.

Where the tenant appears, and enters into the consent rule, and at the trial refuses to confess, the lessor of the plaintiff cannot take out execution against him for his costs, because the judgment is against the casual ejector. Barn. 182. But the tenant is liable to the costs under the consent rule, and he may void will determine an election. Hob. 152.

A wife hath her election which to take, of a jointure made after marriage, or her dower, on the death of the husband, and not before.

Dyer, 358.

Formerly a wife had frequently to elect between her dower and a devise to her by her husband out of his real or personal estate. The 3 and 4 W.4. c. 105. has, however, taken away her election, and declared in what cases she shall retain, and when she shall be precluded of dower. See tit. Dower, IV.

According to the doctrine of election, fully established in courts of equity, a party cannot take a benefit under a will or deed, and also in contravention of the will or deed, but must make his election: If a testator devises an estate, the property of Titius, to which the testator has of course no right, and by his will also gives Titius a legacy, Titius cannot hold the estate and also claim the legacy. He shall not take the benefit under the will unless he suffers the whole instrument to take effect. It is immaterial (though once held not so) whether the testator thought he had a right to dispose of the estate of Titius, or whether he meant, by an arbitrary exertion of power, to exceed his authority. If Titius will avail himself of the testator's bounty, he shall not disturb his will. See Bac. Ab. Election (E.) (ed. by Gwillim and Dodd, and the Addenda.) The question has arisen, and has given rise to much discussion, whether a party electing to retain his property against a will forfeits all the benefits of a devise in his favour under the will, or whether he only gives up so much as to compensate devisees disappointed by his election. It would rather seem that he forfeits the benefit in toto, and that if there is any surplus beyond compen-sating disappointed devisees, it goes to the heir at law. See Bac. Ab. Election (E.), Addenda (ed. by Gwillim and Dodd.) And see 1 Swanston, 442: 1 Roper, Husb. & W. 566. for learned notes by Mr. Swanston and Mr. Jacob.

emblements. 7 Bing. 133.

Though if a feme copyholder for her widowhood sows the land, and before severance takes husband, so that her estate is determined, the lord shall have the emblements; yet if such a feme copyholder, durante viduitate, leases for one year according to custom, and the lessee sows the land, and afterwards the copyholder takes husband, the lessee shall have the corn. 2 Danv. 764.

As the privilege is founded on public policy, and the justice of recompensing the party who suasions, entreaties, money, entertainments. has been at the expense of cultivating the and the like. The punishment for the person land, emblements cannot be claimed by a embracing (the embraceor), is by fine and person although he has an estate which is uncertain in duration, if he is not the individual who sowed the ground, but the charge was incurred during the existence of a pre-vious estate. Therefore if A. seised of land, sows it, and then conveys it to B. for life, remainder to C. for life; and B. dies before the corn is reaped, B.'s executors shall not have it, but it shall go with the land to C .: for here the reason of industry and charge fails. Hob. 132: Winch. 31: Cro. Eliz. 61. 463. So where a tenant for life sows land, and afterwards grants over his estate, the executor of the grantee, who dies before the corn is severed, shall not have emblements; and if a man sow land and let it for life, and the lessee for life die before the corn be reaped, the reversioner, and not his executor, shall have it; but if he had sown it himself it would have been otherwise. Cro. Eliz. 464.

Where there is a right to emblements, ingress, egress, and regress, are allowed by law to enter, cut, and carry them away, when the estate is determined, &c. 1 Inst. 56.

And if a party entitled to emblements grant them to another, the grantee may cut and take them away after the death of the grantor. Shep. Touch. 244. The right to emblements, however, does not give a title to the exclusive occupation of the land; and it would seem, but the point is by no means clear, that if the executors occupy till the corn or other product is ripe, the reversioner may maintain an action for the use and occupation of the land. renewed.

Sec. 1. The Governor and Company of the Bank of England are to enjoy such exclusive privilege of banking as is thereby given as a body corporate for the period and upon the terms after mentioned.

Sec. 2. During the continuance of such privilege, no banking company, exceeding six persons, is to issue bills or notes payable on demand in London, or within sixty-five miles thereof.

But by § 3. any company or partnership, although consisting of more than six persons, may carry on the business of banking in London, or within sixty-five miles thereof, provided it does not berrow or take up money on bills or notes payable on demand, or at any less time than six months.

Sec. 4. After the 1st of August, 1834, all notes of the Bank of England, payable on demand, issued in any part of England out of London, are to be made payable at the place where issued.

Sec. 5. Upon a year's notice, given within six months after the expiration of ten years from the 1st of August, 1834, and repayment of the debt due to it from the public, in the manner thereinafter stipulated, in the event of such notice being deterred until after the 1st of August, 1855, the exclusive privileges of the Bank are to cease. Sec. 6. After the 1st of August, 1834, Bank notes are to be a legal tender for all sums above five pounds, so long as the Bank shall pay on demand such notes in legal coin; provided no such notes shall be deemed a legal tender by the Bank of England or any branch bank thereof; the Governor and Company are not to be liable to pay at any branch bank notes not made specially payable there; but bond, damages, &c., are said to be entire when shall be liable to pay at the Bank of England they cannot be divided or apportioned. all notes of the Governor and Company, or of any branch thereof.

Sec. 8. An account of the bullion and securities of the Bank, and of notes in circulation. and deposits, is to be transmitted weekly to the Chancellor of the Exchequor; such accounts to be consolidated every month, and an average state of the Bank accounts of the precoding three months therefrom made, is to be published every month in the London Ga.

Sects. 9 and 10. One-fourth part of the debt of 14.656,500l., due from the public to the Bank is to be repaid, and the capital stock of the Bank (in case it shall be so determined at a General Court of Proprietors to be held before the 5th of October, 1834) reduced from 14,533,000l. to 10,914,750l.

Sec. 43. The Bank, in consideration of the exclusive privileges given by the act, is to deduct the annual sum of 120,000l., from the sums allowed for the management of the national debt.

Sec. 14. The provisions of the 39 and 40 G. 3. are to remain in force, except as thereby altered: at any time upon twelve months notice after the 1st of August, 1835, and repayment of the debt then due from the public to the Bank, its exclusive privileges are to determine.

A court of equity cannot now be created by the king, but the same must be done by act of parliament. 4 Inst. 84.

The distinction between law and equity, as ty; so that when a charge is made upon one, administered in different courts, is not at prebroken to pieces, the idea of a court of equity, as distinguished from a court of law, did not subsist in the original plan of partition. For though equity is mentioned by Bracton, l. 2. a knight, because anciently none but knights c. 7. pl. 23. as a thing contrasted to strict law; yet neither in that writer, nor in Glanvill or auspices and in the name of Edward I. and jurisdictions), is there a syllable to be found relating to the equitable jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. It seems therefore probable, that when the courts of law, proceeding merely Equitas; quasi equalitas. Is defined to upon the ground of the king's original writs, and confining themselves strictly to that bottom, gave a harsh or imperfect judgment, the application for redress used to be to the king in person, assisted by his privy council (from whence also arose the jurisdiction of the Court waste against a tenant that holds but for one tom not only among our Saxon ancestors, before the institution of the Aula regia, but in the Court of King's Bench, obtained by also after its dissolution, in the reign of King Edward I., and perhaps, during its continuance, in that of Henry II. Ll. Ed. c. 2: Lamb. Arch. 59.

When about the end of the reign of King Edward III. uses of land were introduced, and though totally discountenanced by the courts of common law, were considered as fiduciary deposits, and binding in conscience by the clergy, the separate jurisdiction of the Chancery as a court of equity began to be estublished. Spelm. Gloss. 106: 1 Lev. 242. cstublished. Spelm. Gloss. 106: 1 Lev. 242. John Waltham, who was bishop of Salisbury, and chancellor to King Richard II. (by a strained interpretation of the statute of Westm. 2. [13 Ed. 1. c. 24.] enabling the clerks in Chancery to form new writs according to the special circumstances of each case,) devised the writ of subpana, returnable in the Court of Chancery only, to make the feoffee to uses accountable to his cestui que use, which process was afterwards Earl of Notational Times and the limit to discover and zealous defender of the laws and constitution of his country; and endued with a pervading genius, that enabled him to discover and to pursue the true spirit of justice, notwithstanding the embarrassments raised by the narrow and technical notions which then prevailed in the courts of law, and wholly determinable at the common law upon wholly determinable at the common law, upon the imperfect ideas of redress which had posfictitious suggestions, for which therefore the sessed the courts of equity. The reason and chancellor is, by stat. 17 Rich. 2. c. 6. directed necessities of mankind, arising from the great to give damages to the party unjustly ag- change in property by the extension of trade, grieved. But as the clergy had long attempt- and the abolition of military tenures, co-opeed to turn their ecclesiastical courts into courts of equity, by entertaining suits pro lasione fidei, as a spiritual offence against conscience, in case of non-payment of debts, or any breach of civil contracts, till checked by the Constitutions of Clarendon (10 Hen. 2. c. 15.), therefore probably the ecclesiastical chancellors, who then held the seal, were remiss in abridging their own newly acquired jurisdiction, especially as the spiritual courts continued to grasp at the same authority as before, till finally prohibited by the unanimous concurrence of all the judges; however, it appears from the parliament rolls, that in the reigns of Henry IV. and V. the Commons were repeatedly urgent to have the writ of subpana entirely suppressed, as being a novelty devised against the form of the common law. But though the stat. 4 H. 4. c. 23. was passed, whereby judgments at law are declared irrevocable, unless by attaint or writ of error, yet in Edward IVth's time, the process by bill and subpæna was become the daily practice of the court, though its jurisdiction tive thereto an appeal lies to the House of was not then nearly so extensive as at pre- Lords. The jurisdiction exercised by our courts rally founded on some circumstance which prevents the party being relievable at law; as, where a bond, or other instrument or security, is lost, equity will interiere, by compelling a discovery from the defendant, and will relieve upon such discovery; but the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief upon a mere suggestion that the bond, instrument, or security is lost; but is required, for the purpose of relief, to annex to his bill an affidavit to such effect. 3 Atk. 17: Mitford's Treatise, 112. Walmsley v. Child, 1 Vez. 341.

To establish the origin of any branch of legal or equitable jurisdiction is always difficult. and seldom necessary, provided the exercise of such jurisdiction is sanctioned by the dictates of reason, and found to be conducive to the ends of substantial justice; and such will appear to be the nature and tendency of the jurisdiction exercised by our courts of equity in cases of partition, upon a reference to the difficulties which obstructed the mode of proceeding at common law; and though many of those difficulties are removed by stat. 8 and 9 W. 3. c. 31. yet still, if the parties are in any degree complicated, it is extremely difficult to proceed at law, or where the tenants in possession are seised of particular estates only; for the persons entitled in remainder cannot be bound by the judgment in a writ of partition. Mitford's Treatise, p. 110. Neither can a feme covert be bound by partition by writ (Co. Lit. 166. a.), which, it should seem, she may be by decree and commission in equity. Martyn v. Perryman, 1 Ch. Rep. 125. On these considerations, and the almost constant occasion that the parties have for a discovery, is founded this branch of equitable jurisdiction, in the exercise of which our courts of equity are constantly governed by an anxious attention to the legal title of the plaintiff; for though, at law, it be sufficient to allege seisin, yet in equity the plaintiff must show his title. Cartwright v. Pultney, 2 Atk. 380. And if the defendant contest the legal title, the court will dismiss the bill. Bishop of Ely v. Kenrick, Bunb. 322; but see Parker v. Gerard, Ambler, 286. And, as a further mean to prevent innovation and vexatious suits, courts of equity will never allow costs on bills of partition; courts of law allowing none on the proceeding by writ. Metcalf v. Beckwith, 2 P. Wms. 276: Mitford's Treatise, 111. And this rule prevails, notwith-standing the unequal interests of the parties. Parker v. Gerard, Ambler, 236. With respect to the exclusive jurisdiction exercised by our courts of equity in matters of trust, and in those cases where the principles of substantial justice entitle the party to relief, but the positive law is silent, it seems impossible to define with exactness its boundaries, or to enumerate with precision its various principles. In the course of this work, however, a variety of instances appear, from which the wisdom of this branch of equitable jurisdiction will be fully and satisfactorily established, and to which, at present, it may be sufficient to refer. See particularly tits.

The essential difference (says Blackstone) between law and equity principally consists in the different modes of administering justice in each, in the mode of proof, the mode of trial, and the mode of relief. Upon these, and upon two other accidental grounds of jurisdiction, viz. the true construction of securities for money lent, and the form or effect of a trust or second use, hath been principally erected that structure of jurisprudence which prevails in our courts of equity, and is inwardly bottomed upon the same substantial foundations as the system of the courts of common law.

As to the mode of proof, when facts, or their leading circumstances, rest only in the knowledge of the party, a court of equity applies itself to his conscience, and purges him, upon oath, with regard to the truth of the transaction; and, that being once discovered, the judgment is the same in equity as it would have been at law. But, for want of this discovery, at law, the courts of equity have acquired a concurrent jurisdiction with every other court in all matters of account. 1 Chan. C. 57. As incident to accounts, they take a title deeds, or of removing impediments to concurrent cognizance of the administration has never been doubted. The mode of trial is by interrogatories administered to the witnesses, upon which their depositions are taken in writing, wherever they happen to reside. If, therefore, the cause arises in a foreign country, and the witnesses reside upon the spot; if in causes arising in England, the witnesses are abroad, or shortly to leave the kingdom; or if the witnesses residing at home are aged or infirm; any of these cases lays a ground for a court of equity to grant a commission to examine them, and (in consequence) to exercise the same jurisdiction which might have been exercised at law, if the witnesses could probably attend.

See tit. Depositions.

With respect to the mode of relief. The want of a more specific remedy than can be obtained in the courts of law gives a concurrent jurisdiction to a court of equity in a great variety of cases. To instance executory agreements. A court of equity will demption, if, when called upon by the mortcompel them to be carried into strict execution, unless where it is improper or impossible; instead of giving damages for their nonperformance. Eq. Ca. Ab. 16. And hence a fiction is established, that what ought to be done shall be considered as being actually analogy to the statute of limit ations. See also tits. Bond, Mortgage, Penalty.

The form of a Trust, or second use, gives done, and shall relate back to the time when the courts of equity an exclusive jurisdiction, it ought to have been done originally; and this fiction is so closely pursued through all its consequences, that it necessarily branches created in the present complicated mode of out into many rules of jurisprudence, which form a certain regular system. 3 P. Wms. 215. A court of equity will not decree performance of one part of an agreement, leaving the other parts unperformed. 2 Bligh, 595. It is discretionary in the court to decree a specific a regular positive system established in the performance. 1 Vez. & Bea. 527. And the court has no power to alter the contracts of parties, in consequence of a change having occurred not contemplated at the time. 2 Ball. & B. 288. Of waste, and other similar injuries, a court of equity takes a concurrent cognizance, in order to prevent them by injunction. 1 Ch. Rep. 11: 2 Ch. C. 32. If one act of waste is the taking bills pro confesso" comprises five proved, the court will restrain equitable waste principal objects of great importance to the

And courts of equity have a jurisdiction to try matters of fact, without directing an issue. 3 Ves. & Bea. 42: 4 Dow, 318.

As to the construction of securities for money lent; when courts of equity held the penalty of a bond to be the form, and that in substance it was only as a pledge to secure the repayment of the sum bona fide advanced, with a proper compensation for the use, they laid the foundation of a regular series of determinations which have settled the doctrine of personal pledges or securities, and are equally applicable to mortgages of real property. The mortgagor continues owner of the land, the mortgagee of the money lent upon it: but this ownership is mutually transferred, and the mortgagor is barred from regagee, he does not redeem within a time limited by the court; or he may, when out of possession, be barred, by length of time, by

They poor or ignorant parties. 5. Preventing obstinate parties from impeding the course of justice, by refusal to comply with the decrees or whereby they escaped the penalty of their orders of the court.

Previous to this act courts of equity could act only in personam and not in rem: when, therefore, a bill was filed, or a suit instituted, and a party defendant refused to appear, a court of equity had no power but to order that he should be committed to prison; from prison the defendant was brought up to the bar of the court, and ordered to enter an appearance; if he then refused, the court entered an appearance for him. So if a defendant refused to put in an answer, all the court could do was to commit him to prison, and take the bill pro confesso. It had no power to compel him to execute the act for the non-appearance of which he stood committed.

With regard to process; if a party were committed to prison for refusing to obey the orders of the court, he was brought into court, first by writ of habeas corpus, where he was told what he was to do, and if he refused, he was remanded to prison: the second time he was brought up by an alias hab. corp. and the same scene was performed, if he persisted in his refusal: the third time he was brought up by a pluries alias hab. corp., and after the same forms had been again gone through, he was again remanded to prison; if he continued obstinate, the fourth and last time he was brought up by a writ of alias pluries alias hab. corp.; and then, if he still persisted in his refusal, the bill was taken against him, pro confesso. became very much abused, the party, in many instances, never in fact being warned or adavowals within the times prescribed by the rules of the court; and yet from whatever cause the party might neglect to answer, he contempt, and lodged in gaol, without there being any obligation upon the person sending him there ever after to take the slightest notice of him. In all such cases there was no power to discharge the defendant from prison; nor indeed was there any such power even after the object of imprisonment was accomplished, by the bill being taken pro confesso. The consequence of this system was, that in the prisons there were always persons committed for such contempt; many of them were originally sent to gaol in consequence of their poverty and ignorance, and some of them, when at last mercifully discharged, had been in confinement for twenty or thirty years; son, and examine the prisoners confined there and what was still worse, no effectual provis- for contempt, and report his opinion to the

Another consequence of this system was, that men were taught to do injustice by the vountarily remained in prison; some to avoid executing deeds and rendering accounts, neglect or refusal, while honest suitors were defrauded of their just rights: others were content to submit to the inconvenience of a gaol, though rich enough, and competent at any time to obtain their release, through mere obstinacy, or a desire to live riotously upon the assets of their creditors; and many held lucrative appointments in the prison which they were unwilling to resign.

The provisions of the 1 W. 4. c. 36. are intended to remedy all these inconveniences, for which purpose the act recites and sanctions twenty rules and regulations which are to be adopted by the Court of Chancery, and also, with the exception of the first four, by the Court of Exchequer. The effect of these rules is thus stated in Jemmett's Edit. of the Acts, relating to the administration of justice in courts of equity, passed in 1830.

1. The process of the courts is materially shortened by the first five rules; power is given to the courts to enter an appearance for every person who will not enter one within a reasonable period; and when the appearance is entered, the gaoler must discharge the party from custody. 2. Wherever a poor man is unable to discharge the expenses of a suit, he will be immediately brought to the bar of the court, and if upon inquiry his allegation proves true, relief will be immediately given, by putting in the answer for him without expense, by not requiring office copies to be This practice was quite of course, till at last it taken by him, and by allowing gaolers to take the answers and affidavits. Relief is also extended in all cases to persons of unsound mind. monished at all. There were many causes 3. There is no instance in which the impriwhich prevented parties from putting in their sonment of a party in contempt can be prolonged under this act beyond the purpose for which it is imposed, without a special application to the court, and notice of such applicamight be taken up upon an attachment for tion to the party imprisoned. 4. Whenever a party omits to apply for his discharge, the court may discharge him from his contempt and from custody, and pay the costs of the contempt out of any funds belonging to him, over which the court may have power, or make them costs in the cause against him, or may discharge him from the contempt, and leave him in custody for the costs, which may be cleared, if he be insolvent, under the insolvent acts. 7. G. 4. c. 57: 1 W. 4. c. 38. In order to prevent instances of future oppression or neglected imprisonment, provision is made that four times in the year one of the masters in Chancery shall visit the Fleet priion existed in favour of the poor or ignorant, court, giving a representation of the cases which require relief; upon which a solicitor, either to pay the money, or to be foreclosed of and counsel, are to be assigned to them, and his equity; which is done by proceedings in the questions in which they are at issue with the Court of Chancery. But the Chancery other parties brought to as speedy a decision cannot shorten the time of payment of the as possible, and with the utmost convenience mortgage money, where it is limited by exand facility to the prisoners. 5. The provisions in §§ 10 and 11 of the act relating to and then upon non-payment, the practice is cases where a defendant refuses or neglects to answer within a certain time are of importance to the suitor, and particularly call for the attention of the practitioner. 6. Whenever a party is ordered to execute a deed, and refuses to comply, the court is authorised to execute it for him, instead of confining him for the remainder of his life.

By the 2 and 3 W. 4. c. 58. the provisions of the above act are extended, and the Courts of Chancery and Exchequer are empowered in all cases of contempt, besides those thereby provided for, to discharge persons committed from their contempt, except as to the costs thereof; for which costs they shall remain in mortgagor only should redeem during life, or custody, but may be relieved under the in-

In the 2 and 3 W. 4. c. 111. an act was passed for abolishing certain sinecure offices connected with the Court of Chancery. by 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 84. and 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 94. provision was made for the performance of the duties of some of the offices which had mortgagee shall have the land absolutely, as been abolished, and for regulating the pro- a purchaser, &c. V. What Defence may be made by a Defendant in Error .- The defendant may plead either the common joinder in nullo est erratum, or a special plea, or may demur.

The common joinder (in nullo est erratum) alleges there is no error in the record and proceeding, and prays the court to examine them,

II. Of the Difference between voluntary and negligent Escapes; and Escapes on Mesne Process, and Execution.—There are two kinds of escapes; voluntary and negligent: Voluntary is when one arrests another for felony, or other crime, and lets him go by consent; in which case the party that permits the escape is esteemed guilty of the crime committed, and must answer for it. Negligent escape, is when one is arrested, and afterwards escapes against the will of him that arrests him, or had him in custody; and is not pursued by fresh suit, and taken again before the party pursuing hath lost sight of him. Cromp. Jus. And for these negligent escapes, the gaoler, &c. is to be fined. One negligent escape will not amount to a forfeiture of a gaol-fine for suffering a negligent escape of a per- posse comitatus. 1 Rol. Ab. 807: 1 Jon. 207: son attainted, was by the common law of 1 Rol. Rep. 388: 3 Lev. 46. If any prisoner escapes who was in execution, his creditors may retake him by cap. ad satisfac., or bring action of debt on the judgment, or a scire facias against him, &c. Vent. 269: 3 Salk. 160. If a man escapes with the consent of the gaoler, in a civil case, he cannot retake him. 3 Rep. 32. 52: 1 Sid. 330. But the plaintiff may retake him at any time. Stat. 8 and 9 W. 3. c. 27.

If the plaintiff permit the prisoner to escape, he cannot afterwards retake him; and if the body and goods, &c. of a conusor are taken in execution upon a statute-merchant, if the conusee agree that he shall go at large, it is a discharge of the whole execution, and the conusor shall have his lands again: it is otherwise if the sheriff had permitted him to escape, the execution on the lands would not be discharged. 2 Nels. Abr. 737.

A difference is to be observed between permissive and negligent escapes, with respect to the sheriff; for if a sheriff suffer a prisoner voluntarily to go at large, the sheriff cannot retake him even upon fresh suit; and if he does, the prisoner may have an action of trespass against him. Carter, 212.

(B.) ESCAPES IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Escapes in criminal cases are of three. kinds:-by the party himself; by an officer or other person having the custody of the offender; and by a stranger: for which last kind see tit. Rescue.

I. 1. Of an Escape by the Party himself; 2. Of an Escape suffered by an Officer, &c.; 3. Where it shall be adjudged Voluntary, and where Negligent.

II. Of the retaking of the Prisoner.

III. 1. How the Officer suffering an Escape is to be indicted; and 2. How the Escape is to be tried and adjudged.

IV. Of the Punishment of, 1. Voluntary, and 2. Negligent Escapes.

I. 1. Of an Escape by the party himself.— All persons being bound to submit themselves to the judgment of the law, whoever (after being lawfully arrested) refuses to undergo that imprisonment which the law thinks fit to impose on him, and frees himself from it before such time as he is delivered by due course of law, though he does not use any force or violence, is guilty of a high contempt, punishable with fine and imprisonment. 2 Hawk.c. 17. § 5: 4 Comm. 129.

2. Of an Escape suffered by an Officer, &c. -An officer is not chargable with the escape of an offender unless there has been an actual Therefore if the officer only see a arrest. man shut up in a house, and challenge him as his prisoner, but never actually have him in his custody, and the party get free, the officer cannot be charged with an escape. 2 Hawk.

A gaoler refusing to receive a person ar-

P. committed, and the party is neither indicted nor appealed, &cc. it is no escape to suffer a person to go at large. Fitz. Coron. 224: Bro. Esca. 27, 28.

If a private person arrest another for suspicion of sclony, he is to deliver him to a public officer, who ought to have the custody of a prisoner break a gaol, this seems to be a him; for if he let him go it will be an escape. 2 Hawk. A. But it is otherwise if he never takes him, nor attempts it, and lets him go. 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 594.

A private person is equally punishable with an officer for permitting an escape: but with this distinction, if a felon escape by force gence, may retake him at any time after, from a private person, the latter is excused, whether he find him in the same or in a difbecause he cannot raise power to assist him; but an officer is not wholly excused, because he may take sufficient strength to his assist-

3. Where it shall be adjudged Voluntary; and where Negligent .- There can be no doubt the liberty gained by the prisoner is wholly ovbut that wherever an officer, who hath the ing to his own wrong, there seems to be no custody of a prisoner charged with and guilty of a capital offence, doth knowingly give him his liberty, with an intent to save him either from his trial or execution, he is guilty of a voluntary escape; and thereby involved in the guilt of the same crime of which the prisoner was guilty and stood charged with. And it seems to be the opinion of Sir Matthew Hale, that in some cases an officer may be adjudged guilty of such escape, who hath not such intent, but only means to give his prisoner that liberty which, by the law, he hath no colour of right to give him.

A negligent escape is where the party imprisoned escapes against the will of the officer, and is not freshly pursued and taken before he is lost sight of.

If the gaoler so closely pursue the prisoner, who flies from him, that he retake him without losing sight of him, the law looks on the prisoner so far in his power all the time, as not to adjudge such a flight to amount at all to an escape; but if the gaoler once lose sight of the prisoner, and afterwards retake him, he seems, in strictness, to be guilty of an escape; and a fortiori therefore, if he kill him in the pursuit, he is in like manner guilty, though he never lost sight of him, and could not oth- tion to escape, it is a good excuse for the gaoerwise take him, not only because the king ler, that, before the action brought, he took rested by the constable for felony, whereby he loses the benefit he might have had from the C. c. 19.

And if a person in custody hang or drown himself, this is considered a negligent escape in the gaoler or officer, for not using more precaution to prevent a prisoner thus making negligent escape, because there wanted either due strength in the gaol that should have secured him, or due vigilance in the gaoler that should have prevented it. 1 Hale, 600. A., a mere private man, knows B. to have It would be competent, however, to a gaoler

> II. Of the re-taking of the Prisoner.-It seems to be clearly agreed by all the books, that an officer making a fresh pursuit after a prisoner, who hath escaped through his negliferent county. And it is said generally in some books, that an officer who hath negli. gently suffered a prisoner to escape, may retake him wherever he finds him, without mentioning any fresh pursuit: and indeed, since reason he should take any manner of advantage from it. But where a gaoler hath voluntarily suffered a prisoner to escape, it is said by some that he can no more justify the retaking him, than if he had never had him in custody before, because by his own free consent he hath admitted, that he hath nothing to do with him. Co. Jac. 659.

> But although this position may hold in cases of arrest and imprisonment in civil process, yet as the public good requires that offenders should be brought to justice, it would hardly be contended at the present day, that a gaoler who had voluntarily suffered a prisoner indicted for murder to escape, should not be allowed in some degree to redeem his offence by re-

Wherever a prisoner, by the negligence of his keeper, gets so far out of his power that the keeper loses sight of him, the keeper is finable at the discretion of the court, notwithstanding he retook him immediately after; for it seems agreed, that this is to be adjudged a negligent escape, which implies an offence, and consequently that it must be punishable. It is true, indeed, that in an action against a gaoler for suffering one arrested in a civil ac-the prisoner upon fresh suit, which is well to show the time when the offence was commaintained by showing that he pursued him mitted, for which the party was in custody, immediately after notice of the escape, though not only that it may appear that it was prior it were some hours after it, and retook him; to the escape, but also that it was subsequent but it does not from hence follow, that the like to the last general pardon. Also it seems excuse will serve for the negligent escape of a clear, that every indictment for a volun-criminal, because this is an offence against tary escape must allege that the defendant the public, but the other is only a private dam-felonice and voluntarie A. B. ad largum ire age to the party: neither will it be a hardship permisit; and must also show the species of to the officer to be exposed to such punishment as the court, in its discretion, shall think ed: for it is not sufficient to say in general, fit to impose upon him for the negligent escape that he was in custody for felony, &c. of a criminal, as it would be to be liable to an action of escape, for suffering a person in his custady, in a civil action, to escape; for that in the former case the court would moderate his fine according to the circumstances of the ing another, it is trespass only, and not felony, whole matter, and would certainly mitigate, if till the party wounded is dead: and he who not wholly excuse it, if he should appear to have taken all reasonable care: but in the other case, if he should be liable to an action his judgment would not lie in the discretion of the court, but he would be bound to pay the whole debt for which the party was in custody, if the escape should be adjudged against him. However, it is certain, that it will be no advantage to a gaoler to re-take his prisoner after he has been fined for the escape, as is shown in the precedent section of Hawk. P. C., also it is clear that he cannot excuse himself by killing a prisoner in the pursuit, though he could not possibly retake him: but must, in such case, be contented to submit to such a fine as his negligence shall appear to deserve. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 19.

III. 1. How the Officer suffering an Escape is to be indicted .- The indictment must expressly show, that the party was actually in that the person who has them in custody is the defendants's custody for a crime, action, in no case punishable for their escape, except or commitment for it; and that it is not sufficient to say that he was in the defendant's for by stat. The crime of the prisoner escaping, for which the gaoler is answerable, must be such as it was at the time of the escape; as where a person is committed for dangerously woundsuffers another to escape, who was in custody for felony, cannot be arraigned for such escape as for felony, until the principal is attainted, but he may be indicted and tried for misprison before the attainder of the principal. And in high treason it is said the escape is immediately punishable, whether the party escaping be ever convicted or not. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 19. See post, IV. 1.

By 4 G. 4. c. 64. § 44. in case of any prosecution for an escape, attempt to escape, breach of prison, or rescue, either against the prisoner escaping, or any other person concerned therein, a certificate by the clerk of the court wherein the offender shall have been convicted, shall, with proof of his identity, be sufficient evidence of the nature and fact of the conviction, and of the species and period of confinement to which he was sentenced.

2. How the Escape is to be tried and adjudged .- Where persons, being present in a court of record, are committed to prison by such court, the keeper of the gaol is bound to have them always ready, whenever the court shall demand them of him; and if he shall fail to produce them at such demand, the court will adjudge him guilty of an escape, without any further inquiry, unless he have some reasonable matter to allege in his excuse; as that the prison was set on fire, or broke open by enemies, &c. for he shall be concluded, by the record of the commitment, to deny that the prisoners were in his custody. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 19.

As to other prisoners who are not so committed, but are in the custody of a goaler, sheriff, constable, or other person, by any other means whatsoever, it seems agreed, in some special cases, until it be presented; by the sheriff, nor by any other, for the essoner went at large. P. C. c. 19.

By stat. 1 Ric. 3. c. 3. justices of peace have authority to inquire in their session of as if he had actually suffered it himself, and all manner of escapes of every person arrested and imprisoned for felony.

Wherever an escape is fineable, the presentment of it is traversable; but where the offence is amerciable only, there the presentment is of itself conclusive; such amercement being reckoned among those minima de quibus non curat lex; and this distinction seems to be well warranted by the old books. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 19.

IV. 1. Of the Punishment of Voluntary Escapes .- A voluntary escape amounts to the same kind of crime, and is punishable in the same degree, as the offence of which the party was guilty, and for which he was in custody, whether it be treason, felony, or trespass; and whether the person escaping were actually committed to some gaol, or under an arrest only; and whether he were attainted, or only accused of such crime.

1 Hawk. P. C. c. 19.

But the officer cannot be thus punished till the original delinquent hath actually received judgment, or been attainted upon verdict, confession, or outlawry of the crime for which he was so committed or arrested: otherwise it might happen that the officer might be punished for treason or felony, and the person arrested and escaping might be acquitted of the charge against him. But, before the conviction of the principal party, the officer thus neglecting his duty may be fined and imprisoned for a misdemeanor. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 19. § 26.

A sheriff is as much liable to answer for an escape suffered by his bailitf, the court may charge either the sheriff or bailiff for such an escape; and if a deputy gaoler be not sufficient to answer a negligent escape, his principal must answer for him; but if the gaoler who suffers an escape have an estate for life or years in the office, it is not agreed how far he in reversion is liable to be punished. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 19.

Wherever a person is found guilty upon an indictment, or presentment, of a negligent escape of a criminal actually in his custody, he ought to be condemned in a certain sum to be paid to the king, which seems most properly to be called a fine.

It hath been holden, that a negligent escape may be pardoned by the king before it happens, but that a voluntary one cannot be so pardoned. 2 Hawk. P. Č. c. 19.

And it seems by the common law, the penalty for suffering the negligent escape of a person attainted was of course 100l., and for suffering such escape of a person indicted, and not attainted, was 51.; but if the person escaping were neither attainted nor indicted, it seems that it was left to the discretion of the court to assess such a reasonable forfeiture as should seem proper; and if the party had twice escaped, it seems that the penalties above mentioned were of course to be doubled; yet it seems that the forfeiture was to be no greater for suffering a prisoner committed on two several accusations to escape, than if he had been committed but on one. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 19.

It is recited by stat. 5 Ed. 3. c. 8. between forfeiture of lands to the king, and this species of escheat to the lord; which, by reason of their similitude in some circumstances, and because the crown is very frequently the immediate lord of the fee, and therefore entitled to both, have been often confounded together. But, in fact, escheat operates in subordination to this more ancient the lands shall escheat, because the issue in and superior law of forfeiture. 2 Inst. 64: Salk. 85. See tit. Forfeiture, Tenure.

The doctrine of escheat upon attainder, taken singly, is this; that the blood of the tenant, by the commission of any felony, (under which denomination all treasons were formerly comprised, 3 Inst. 15: stat. 25 Ed. 3.c. 2. § 12.), is corrupted and stained, and the shall never escheat to a lord of whom they original donation of the feud is thereby determined. Upon the thorough demonstration of which guilt, by legal attainder, the feudal covenant and mutual bond of fealty are held to be broken, the estate instantly falls back from of the lord's court ought to present it. 2 Inst. the offender to the lord of the fee, and the inheritable quality of his blood is extinguished heirs are born after attainder of felony. 3 and blotted out for ever. See tit. Tenure, II. 7.

In cases of escheat, the blood of the tenant being utterly corrupted and extinguished, it follows, not only that all that he has at the cess against him, he conveys away his land, time of his offence committed shall escheat and afterwards is outlawed, the conveyance from him, but also that he shall be incapable of inheriting any thing for the future. This further illustrates the distinction between forfeiture and escheat. If therefore a father be seised in fee, and the son commits treason and is attainted, and then the father dies: the land shall escheat to the lord, because the son by the corruption of his blood, is incapable to be heir, and there can be no other heir during his life, but nothing shall be forfeited to the king, for the son never had any interest in the lands to forfeit. Co. Lit. 13. In this case the felony except in cases of high treason, petit escheat operates, and not to the forfeiture; treason (which has been subsequently reduced but in the following instance the forfeiture to murder), or murder, shall extend to the disworks, and not the escheat. As where a new inheriting of any heir, or to the prejudice of felony is created by act of parliament, and it the right or title of any person, other than the

There is one singular instance in which lands held in fee-simple are not liable to escheat to the lord, even when their owner is no more, and has left no heirs to inherit them. And this is the case of a corporation; for if a future condition, when a certain thing is that comes by any accident to be dissolved, the donor or his heirs shall have the land again in reversion, and not the lord by the escheat, which is perhaps the only instance where a reversion can be expectant on a grant in fee simple absolute. See tit. Corporation.

It has been decided that where a cestui que trust dies without heirs, the trust does not escheat to the crown, so that the lands may be recovered in a court of equity by the king; but that the trustee shall hold them for his own benefit. Burgess v. Wheate, 1 Black. Rep. 123. See tit. Escheator.

ESQUIRE, from the Fr. esqu, and the Lat. scutum, in Greek ozvros, which signifies a hide, of which shields were anciently made and afterwards covered.] An esquire was he who, attending a knight in the time of war, did carry a shield, whence he was called escuirer in French, and scutifer or armiger (i. e. armourbearer) in Latin.

Hotoman saith, that those whom the French call esquires were a military kind of vassals, having jus scuti, viz. liberty to bear a shield, and in it the ensigns of their family, in token of their gentility or dignity: but this addition hath not now for a long time had any relation to the office or employment of the person to whom it hath been attributed, as to carrying of arms, &c. but it has been merely a title of dignity, and next in degree to a knight.

A sheriff of a county being a superior officer, retains the title of esquire during his life, in respect of the great trust he has in the com-monwealth. The chiefs of some ancient families are esquires by prescription. Blount.

Esquires and gentlemen are confounded together by Sir Edward Coke, 2 Inst. 668. ESTATE.

Fr. Estat. Lat. Status.] That title or interest which a man hath in lands or tenements,

An estate in lands, tenements, and hereditaments (says Blackstone), signifies such interest as the tenant hath therein; so that if a man grants all his estate in Dale to A. and his heirs, every thing that he can possibly grant shall pass thereby. Co. Lit. 345. signifies the [state] condition or circumstance fourth day inclusive, the quarto die post, it was the tenement; secondly, with regard to the be enjoyed; and thirdly, with regard to the fee-simple, and inheritances limited; one spenumber and connexions of the tenants.

First, with regard to the quantity of interest which the tenant has in the tenement, this Dict. tits. Fee and Fee-simple, Tenure, this is measured by its duration and extent. Thus, either his right of possession is to subsist for an uncertain period, during his own as are clogged and confined with conditions or life, or the life of another man; to determine qualifications of any sort, may be divided into at his own decease, or to remain to his deseendants after him; or it is circumscribed within a certain number of years, months, or afterwards fees tail, in consequence of the days; or, lastly, it is infinite and unlimited, being vested in him and his representatives for ever. And this occasions the primary division of estates into such as are freehold, and | such as are less than freehold.

An estate of freehold, liberum tenementum, or frank-tenement, is defined by Britton, c. 32. to be "the passession of the soil by a freeman." And St. Germyn (Dr. & Stud. b. 2. d. 22.) tells us, "that the possession of the land is called, in the law of England, the franktenement, or freehold. Such estate, therefore, and no other, as requires actual possession of as that donation depends upon the concurthe land is, legally speaking, freehold: which actual possession can, by the course of the common law, be only given by the ceremony called livery of seisin, which is the same as the feodal investiture. And from these principles we may extract this description of a freehold; that it is such an estate in lands as is conveyed by livery of seisin; or, in tenements of an incorporeal nature, by what is equivalent thereto. And accordingly it is laid down by Littleton, § 59. that where a freehold shall pass, it behoveth to have livery of seisin. As therefore estates of inheritance and estates for life, could not, by common law, be conveyed without livery of seisin, these are properly estates of freehold; and, as no other estates were conveyed with the same solemnity, therefore no others are properly freehold estates. 2 Comm. 103, 104.

Mr. Christian, in his note on the above passage, says, a freehold estate seems to be any estate of inheritance, or for life, in either a corporeal or incorporeal hereditament, existing in or arising from real property of free tenure; that is, now, of all which is not copyhold. The learned commentator himself has elsewhere informed us, that "tithes and spiritual dues are freehold estates, whether the land out of which they issue are bond or free; being a separate and distinct inheritance from the lands themselves." And, in this view, they must be distinguished and excepted from other incorporeal hereditaments issuing out of lands, as rents, &c. which in general will follow the nature of their principal, and cannot be freehold, unless the stock from which they spring be freehold also. 1 Blackst. Tracts, 116.

of inheritance. The former are again divided called a reversion .- Of estates in possession time at which that quantity of interest is to into inheritances absolute, otherwise called cies of which is usually called fee-tail.

Limited fees, or such estates of inheritance two kinds. 1. Qualified or base fees. 2. Fees conditional; so called at the common law, and statute de donis. As to these latter, see this Dict. tits. Tail and Fee Tail, Tenures .- A base or qualified fee is such a one as has a qualification subjoined thereto, and which must be determined whenever the qualification annexed to it is at an end. As in the ease of a grant to A. and his heirs tenants of the manor of Dale; in this instance, whenever the heirs of A. cease to be tenants of that manor, the grant is entirely defeated. This estate is a fee, because, by possibility, it may endure for ever in a man and his heirs: yet, rence of collateral circumstances, which qualify and debase the purity of the donation, it is therefore a qualified or base fee. 2 Comm. See 1 Inst. 27.

Of estates of freehold, not of inheritance, but for life only, some may be called conventional, as being expressly created by the act of the parties; others are merely legal, or created by construction and operation of law. See tit. Freehold .- As to estates for life, expressly created by deed or grant, see this Dict. tit. Life Estate .- As to the estate of tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct, see tit. Tail and Fee Tail. As to tenant by the Curtesy, and tenant in Dower, see those titles.

Of estates less than freehold there are three sorts. 1. Estates for years. 2. Estates at will: as to both which, see this Dict. tit. Lease. 3. Estates by sufferance: as to which, see this Dict. tit. Sufferance.

Under the second of the above divisions, Blackstone enumerates copyholds, which originally were mere estates at will. See tit.

Comphold.

Besides these several divisions of estates, in point of interest, another species may be mentioned, viz. estates upon condition; as to which, see at large, tit. Condition, and tits. Mortgage, Statute-Merchant, Statute-Staple,

Elegit.

According to the above division, estates are considered solely with regard to their duration, or the quantity of interest which the owners have therein. With regard to the time of their enjoyment, when the actual receipt of the rents and profits begins, estates may be considered as either in possession or expectancy.—Of expectancies there are two Estates of freehold may then be considered, sorts, one created by the act of the parties, either as estates of inheritance, or estates not called a remainder; the other by act of law, whereby a present interest passes to and several tenures, see this Dict. tit. Tenure. abides in the tenant, not depending on any subsequent circumstance or contingency, as in the cases of estates executory), little or nothing is to be peculiarly observed; all the estates already spoken of, and treated of under the titles referred to, are of this kind. But the doctrine of estates in expectancy contains some of the nicest and most abstruse learning in the English law .-- And as to so much of it as relates to Remainders and Reversions, see this Dict. under those titles, and tits. Executory Devise, Limitation.

Estates, with regard to the certainty, and the time of the enjoyment of them, are distinguished by Fearne in the introduction to his Essay on Contingent Remainders and Executory Devises, into, 1. Estates vested in possession. 2 Estates vested in interest, as reversions; vested remainders; such executory devises, future uses, conditional limitatations, and other future interests as are not referred to, or made to depend on, a period or event that is uncertain. 3. Estates contingent; as contingent remainders; and such executory devises, future uses, conditional limitations, and other future interests as are referred to, or made to depend on an event that is uncertain. An estate is vested when there is an immediate fixed right of present or future enjoyment.—An estate is vested in 4 T. R. 89: 11 East, 518. And a similar efpossession when there exists a right of present enjoyment .- An estate is vested in interest when there is a present fixed right of future enjoyment. An estate is contingent when a right of enjoyment is to accrue on an tute equitable assets for the payment of debts, event which is dubious and uncertain.

With respect to the number and connexions of their owners, the tenants who occupy and hold them, estates of any quantity or length of duration, whether in actual possession or expectancy, may be held in four different ways; severalty; in joint-tenancy; in coparcenary: in common.—He that holds lands in severalty, or is sole tenant thereof, is he that holds them in his own right only, without any viz. ESTOPPEL, from the Fr. estouper, i. e. oppilare, obstipare.] An impediment or bar to a right of action arising from a man's own act: or where he is forbidden by law to speak against his own deed; for by this act or acceptance he may be estopped to allege or speak the truth. ESTRAY, Extrahura, from the old Fr. Estrayeur.] Is any valuable animal that is church, and two nearest market-towns on two market days, and is not claimed by the owner within a year and a day, it belongs to the king; and now, most commonly, by grant of the crown, to the lord of the liberty. Brit. cap. 17.

It is confirmatory of this origin of the right of taking estrays, that the cattle of the king are not subject to it. 1 Roll. Ab. 878.

It has been suggested that the true reason of the law thus giving the estray to the king or his grantee, and not to the finder, is, that the owner has thus the best chance of having his property restored to him; and it lessens the temptation to commit thefts, as it prevents a man from pretending that he had found as an estray, what he had actually stolen: or according to the vulgar phrase, that he had found that which never was lost.

Any beasts may be estrays, that are by nature tame or reclaimable, and in which there is a valuable property, as sheep, oxen, swine, and horses.—But animals upon which the law sets no value, as a dog or cat: and animals feræ naturæ, as a bear or wolf, cannot be considered as estrays. 1 Comm. 298. Swans may be estrays, but no other fowl, and are to be proclaimed, &c. 1 Roll. Ab. 878. If the beast stray to another lordship within the year, after it hath been an estray, the first lord cannot re-take it, for until the year and day be past, and proclamation made as aforesaid, he hath no property; and therefore the possession of the second lord is good against him. Cro. Eliz. 716: Finch, L. 177. If the cattle were never proclaimed, the owner may take them at any time. And where a beast is proclaimed as the law directs, if the owner claim it in a year and a day, he shall have it again, but must pay the lord for keeping. 1 Roll. Ab. 879: Finch, 177. But if any person finds and takes care of another's property, not being entitled to it as an estray, the owner may recover it or its value, without paying the expenses of keeping. 2 Blackst. ESTREPE, Fr. Estropier.] To make spoils in lands to the damage of another, as of be directed and delivered to the tenant himthe reversioner, &c.

An owner may seize an estray, without | ESTREPEMENT, Estrepamentum, from

This word is used for a writ, which lies in Ed. 1. c. 13. when a person having an action sues to prohibit the tenant from making waste during the suit: the other is for the demandant, who is adjudged to recover seisin of the land in question, after judgment and before execution sued by the writ of habere facias possessionem, to prevent waste being made till he gets into possession. Reg. Orig. 76: Reg. Judic. 33: F. N. B. 60, 61: 3 Inst.

In suing out these two writs, this difference was formerly observed; that in actions merely possessory, where no damages are recovered, time pendente lite, nay, even at the time of suing out the original writ or first process: but in an action where damages were recovered, the demandant could only have a writ of estrepement, if he was apprehensive of waste, after verdict had; for with regard to waste done before the verdict was given, it was presumed the jury would consider that in assessing the damages. F. N. B. 60, 61. But now it seems to be held by an equitable construction of the stat. of Glouc. and in advancement of the remedy, that a writ of estrepement to prevent waste, may be had in every stage as well of such actions wherein damages are recovered, as of those wherein only possession is had of the lands; for perhaps the tenant may not be able to satisfy the demandant his tull action of waste itself to recover the place wasted, and also damages, a writ of estrepement will lie as well before as after judgment For the plaintiff cannot recover damages for more waste than is contained in his original complaint; neither is he at liberty to assign or give in evidence any waste made after suing out the writ: it is therefore reasonable that he should have this writ of preventive justice, since he is in his present suit debarred of any further remedy. 5 Rep. 115.

If a writ of estrepement forbidding waste self, as it may be, and he afterwards proceeds to commit waste, an action may be carried on] upon the foundation of this writ, wherein the only plea of the tenant can be, non fecit vastum contra prohibitionem; and if upon verdict is be found that he did, the plaintiff may recover costs and damages; or the party may lessee. 10 Rep. 128. Where lands taken on proceed to punish the defendant for the contempt. Moor, 100.

As a writ of estrepement may be directed either to the tenant and his servants, or to the sheriff; if it be directed to the tenant and his servant, and they are duly served with it, if they afterwards commit waste, they may be committed to prison for this contempt of the writ. But it is said not to be so when directed to the sheriff, because he may raise the posse comitatus to resist them who make waste. Hob. 85. Though it hath been adjudged, that the sheriff may likewise imprison offenders if he be put to it; and that he may make a warrant to others to do it. 5 Rep. 115: 2 Inst. 329.

The writ of estrepement lies properly where the plaintiff in a real action shall not recover damages by his action, and as it were supplies damages; for damages and costs may be recovered for waste after the writ of estrepement is brought. See Moor, 100: 2 Inst. 328. If tenants commit waste in houses assigned a feme for dower, on her bringing action of dower, writ of estrepement lies. Rep. 115. See Cro. Eliz. 114: Moor, 622. But pending a writ of partition between coparceners, if the tenant commit waste, this writ will not be granted; because there is equal interest between the parties, and the writ will not lie but where the interest of the tenant is to be disproved. EVIDENTIA.] Proof by testimony of witnesses, on oath; or by writings or records.

It is called evidence, because thereby the point in issue in a cause to be tried, is to be made evident to the jury; for probationes debent esse evidentes et perspicuæ. Co. Lit. 283. The evidence to a jury ought to be upon the oath of witnesses; or upon matters of record, or by deeds proved, or other like authenticated matter. 1 Lil. Ab. 547. And evidence containeth testimony of witnesses. and all other proofs to be given and produced to a jury for the finding of any issue joined between parties. Co. Lit. 283.

The system of evidence, as now established in our courts of common law, is very full, comprehensive, and refined; a summary of the law on the subject, is here presented.

The nature of the present work will not allow room for the numberless niceties and distinctions of what is, or is not legal evidence to a jury. A few of the general heads and leading maxims relative to this point, as well as in civil or criminal cases, together with some observations on the manner of Evidence, as has been already remarked, signifies that which demonstrates, makes evident or clear, or ascertains the truth of the very fact or point in issue, either on the one to be admitted to any other point. Therefore upon an action of debt, when the defendant denies his bond by the plea of non est factum, and the issue is, whether it be the defendant's deed or no, he cannot give a release of this bond in evidence, for that does not destroy the bond, and therefore does not prove the issue which he has chosen to rely upon, viz. that the bond has no existence.

Again; evidence in the trial by jury is of two kinds, either that which is given in proof. or that which the jury may receive by their own private knowledge. As to the latter, see tit. Jury. The former, or proofs (to which in common speech the name of evidence is usually confined,) are either written, or parol, that is, by word of mouth. Written proofs, or evidence, are, 1. Records; and 2. Ancient deeds of 30 years' standing, which prove themselves; but, 3. Modern deeds; and 4. there is a process to bring them in by writ of Other writings must be attested and verified subpana ad testificandum; which commands by parol evidence of witnesses. And the one general rule that runs through all the doctrine of trials is this, that the best evidence pounds to be forfeited to the king; to which the nature of the case will admit of shall the stat. 5 Eliz. c. 9. has added a penalty of always be required, if possible to be had; but 101. to the party aggrieved, and damages if not possible, then the best evidence that can be had shall be allowed. For if it be found there is any better evidence existing than is produced, the very not producing it is a presumption that it would have detected some falsehood that at present is concealed. Thus, in order to prove a lease for years, nothing else shall be admitted but the very deed of lease itself, if in being; but if that positively be proved to be burnt or destroyed (not relying on any loose negative, as that it cannot be found, or the like), then an attested copy may be produced, or parol evidence given of its contents. So, no evidence of a discourse with another will be admitted, but the man himself must be produced; yet in some cases (as in proof of any general customs, or matters of common tradition or repute), the courts admit of hearsay evidence, or an account of what persons deceased have declared in their lifetime; but such evidence will not be received of any particular facts. $50, too, books of accounts, or shop-books, are not allowed of themselves to be given in evidence for the owner, but a servant who made the entry may have recourse to them to refresh his memory; and if ed to be secretly concerned in the event; or such servant (who was accustomed to make their interest may be proved in court. Which those entries) be dead, and his hand be proved, the book may be read in evidence. Bull, N. jection to the former class; for no man is to P. 282, 283: Salk. 285. But as this kind of be examined to prove his own infamy. And evidence, even thus regulated, would be much no counsel, attorney, or other person, intrusttoo hard upon the buyer at any long distance ed with the secrets of the cause by the party of time, the stat. 7 Jac. 1, c. 12. (the penners himself, shall be compelled, or perhaps allowof which seem to have imagined that the ed, to give evidence of such conversation or hooks of themselves were evidence at commatters of privacy, as came to his knowledge mon law), confines this species of proof to by virtue of such trust and confidence; but he such transactions as have happened within one year before the action brought; unless between merchant and merchant in the usual intercourse of trade. For accounts of so recent a date, if erroneous, may more easily be unravelled and adjusted.

But if a fact to be proved has been reduced to paper, this will not prevent its being proved by parol evidence. For instance, a receipt of money may be proved by parol evidence, though a written receipt was given. 4 Esp. So the fact of parties standing in the relation of landlord and tenant may be proved by parol, though there is a written contract, but not the terms of the tenancy. 7 B. & C. So also the fact of partnership, though there be a deed of partnership. Ry. & Mo. Ca. 187. So the fact of a marriage need not necessarily be proved by the register; and the inscriptions on banners at a public meeting may be proved without producing them. 3 B. & A. 566.

equivalent to the loss sustained by want of his evidence. But no witness, unless his reasonable expenses be tendered him, is bound to appear at all; nor if he appears, is he bound to give evidence till such charges are actually paid him; except he resides within the bills of mortality, and is summoned to give evidence within the same. This compulsory process, to bring in unwilling witnesses, and the additional terrors of an attachment in cases of disobedience, are of excellent use in the thorough investigation of truth.

All witnesses, of whatever religion or country, that have the use of their reason, are to be received and examined, except such as are infamous, or such as are interested in the event of the cause. All others are competent witnesses; though the jury, from other circumstances, will judge of their credibility. Infamous persons are such as may be challenged as jurors, propter delictum; and therefore shall never be admitted to give evidence to inform that jury, with whom they were too scandalous to associate. Interested witnesses may be examined upon a voire dire, if suspectlast is the only method of supporting an obmay be examined as to mere matters of fact, as the execution of a deed or the like, which might have come to his knowledge without being intrusted in the cause. Bull, N. P. 284: 1 Vent. 97. The indecency of evidence is no objection to its being received when it is necessary to the decision of a civil or criminal right. Coup. 729.

One witness (if credible) is sufficient evidence to a jury of any single fact; though, undoubtedly, the concurrence of two or more corroborates the proof. Yet our law considers that there are many transactions to which only one person is privy; and therefore does not always demand the testimony of two, as the civil law requires.

Positive proof is always required where from the nature of the case it appears it might possibly have been had. But, next to positive proof, circumstantial evidence, or the doctrine of presumptions, must take place: for when the fact itself cannot be demonstra-With regard to parol evidence, or witnesses, tively evinced, that which comes nearest to

VI. from Gilcumstances which either necessarily or usually bert's Law of Evidence; and it concludes with attend such facts; and these are called presumptions which are only to be relied upon till the contrary be actually proved. Stabitur præsumptione donec probetur in contrarium. Co. Lit. 373. Violent presumption is many times equal to full proof; for there those circumstances appear which necessarily attend the fact. Ibid. 6. As if a landlord sues for rent due at Michaelmas 1754, and the tenant cannot prove the payment, but produces an acquittance for rent due at a subsequent time, in full of all demands, this is a violent presumption of his having paid the former rent, and is equivalent to full proof; for though the actual payment is not proved, yet the acquittance in full of all demands is proved, which could not be without such payment; and it therefore induces so forcible a presumption, that no proof shall be admitted to the contrary. Gilb. Evid. 161.

Probable presumption, arising from such circumstances as usually attend the fact, hath also its due weight; as if, in a suit for rent due in 1754, the tenant proves the payment of the rent due in 1755, this will prevail to exonerate the tenant; Co. Lit. 373; unless it be clearly shown that the rent of 1754 was retained for some special reason, or that there was some fraud or mistake; for otherwise it will be presumed to have been paid before that in 1755, as it is most usual to receive first the rents of longest standing. So where a bill of exchange negotiated after acceptance. is produced from the hands of the acceptor after it is due, the presumption is that the acceptor has paid it. 1 Stark. 225: 2 Camp. 439. And see Roscoe on Evidence, p. 14.

The oath administered to the witness is not only that what he deposes shall be true, but that he shall also depose the whole truth: so that he is not to conceal any part of what he knows, whether interrogated particularly to that point or not. And all this evidence is to be given in open court, in the presence of the parties, their attorney, the counsel, and all bystanders; and before the judge and jury; each party having liberty to except to its competency, which exceptions are publicly stated, and by the judge are openly and publicly allowed or disallowed in the face of the country. And if either in his directions or decisions he mis-states the law by ignorance, inadvertance, or design, the counsel on either side may require him publicly to seal a bill of exceptions, stating the point whereon he is supposed to err: or if the legal effect of a record or other evidence is doubted, this may be tried on a demurrer to evidence. But the most usual course is to apply for a new trial on the ground that the evidence has been improperly admitted. 3 Comm. 367-372.

1. The first general rule is that the best evidence must be given that the nature of the thing is capable of. The true meaning of this rule is that no such evidence shall be brought as ex natura rei supposes still a greater evidence behind, in the party's possession or power; for such evidence is altogether insufficient and proves nothing. But if it is proved that an original deed, will, &c. is in the hands of the adverse party, or is destroyed without default of the party who ought to produce it, a copy will be admitted; because then such copy is the best evidence.

In general when any written instrument is in the possession of the opposite party, secondary evidence of the contents is inadmissible without proof of a notice to produce the original. But where, from the nature of the proceedings, the party in possession of the instrument has notice that he is to be charged with the possession of it, as in case of trover for a bond, a notice to produce is unnecessary. 14 East, 274: 6 B. & C. 398. If the party refuses to produce the papers required; such a circumstance does not raise any inference against him, it merely entitles the other party to go on secondary evidence. 3 Camp. 363: 1 Stark. 315.

2. No person interested in the question can be a witness. There is no rule in more general use, and none that is so little understood. See 1 Term Rep. 302. And there are some exceptions to it, c. g. 1. A party interested will be admitted in a criminal prosecution in most instances; 2. He may be admitted for the sake of trade and the common usage of business; as porters, apprentices, &c. to prove delivery of goods, &c. though it tend to clear themselves of neglect. See 3 Term Rep. 29: Str. 647. 1083. 3. Where no other evidence is reasonably to be expected. 4. Where he acquires the interest by his own act, after the party who calls him as a witness has a right to his evidence. 5. Where the possibility of interest is very remote. See 1 Term Rep. 163, 164. and more at length, this tit. Div. II. 1.

The general rule was, that no objection could be made to the competency of a witness unless he was directly interested in the event of the suit, or could avail himself of the verdict in the cause, so as to give it in evidence on any future occasion in support of his own interest. 7 Term Rep. 62: 1 Bing. 260: 4
Bing. 649. But the latter ground of objection has been removed by the 3 and 4 W. 4. c.

42. See the section, post, II.

3. The third general rule is, that hearsay is no evidence. For no evidence is to be admitted but what is upon oath, and if the first speech were without oath, another oath that The true theory of evidence is admirably there was such a speech makes it no more.

Besides, if the speaker be living, it is not the counterfeiting the coin, it was provided that best evidence. But hearsay has been admitted in corroboration of a witness's testimony. And hearsay of members of a family is adbeen repealed, the laws relating to offences mitted to prove a pedigree, and hearsay is admissible to prove public rights; and in some other cases where the party makes a state-ment against his interest. Roscoe on Evidence, 24.

4. In all cases where a general character or behaviour is put in issue, evidence of particular facts may be admitted; but not where it comes in collaterally.

5. Ambiguitas verborum latens verificatione suppletur, nam quod ex facto oritur ambiguum, verificatione facti tollitur.

6. In every issue the affirmative is to be proved. A negative cannot regularly be proved, and therefore it is sufficient to deny what is affirmed until it be proved: but when the affirmative is proved, the other party may contest it with opposite proofs of some matter or proposition totally inconsistent with what is affirmed.

In general, where the issue is on the life or death of a person once existing, the proof lies on the party asserting the death. 2 East's Rep.

312. See post II. 3.

Where the law presumes the affirmative of any fact, the negative of such fact must be proved by the party averring it in pleading. 3 East's Rep. 192.

Thus, where the issue involves a culpable omission, it is incumbent on the party making the charge to prove it, although he must prove a negative; for the other party shall be presumed innocent till proved to be guilty. East, 193: 5 B. & C. 327.

7. No evidence need be given of what is agreed by the pleadings. For the jury are only sworn to try the matter in issue between the parties, so that nothing else is properly before them.

8. Whensoever a man cannot have the advantage of the special matter by pleading, he may give it in evidence on the general issue. See tit. Pleading.

9. If the substance of the issue be proved, it is sufficient. As to this, see also tits. Pleading;

Modo et Forma.

The doctrine of Evidence in CRIMINAL Cases is, in most respects, the same as that upon civil actions. There are, however, a few leading points, wherein by several statutes and resolutions a difference is made between civil and criminal evidence.

1. In all cases of high treason, and misprison of treason, by stats. 1 Ed. 6. c. 12. and 5 written by the same person (2 Hawk. P. C. and 6 Ed. 6. c. 11. two lawful witnesses are 431.); yet undoubtedly the testimony of witrequired to convict a prisoner, unless he shall nesses well acquainted with the party's hand, willingly and without violence confess the that they believe the paper in question to have same. By stat. 1 and 2 P. & M. c. 10. an ex-been written by him, is evidence to be left to ception was made as to treasons in counterfeit- a jury. Lord Preston's case, A. D. 1690, 1694, ing the king's seals or signatures: and by the 4 State Trials, 463: Francia's case, A. D. various acts relating to treasons committed in 1716, 6 State Trials, 69: Layer's case, A. D.

against the coin consolidated, and the crime reduced to felony. By the stat. 7 W. 3. c. 3. in prosecutions for the treasons to which that act extends, the same rule (of requiring two witnesses) is again enforced; with this addition, that the confession of the prisoner, which shall countervail the necessity of such proof. must be in open court. In the construction of which act it hath been holden, that a confession of the prisoner, taken out of court, before a magistrate or person having competent authority to take it, and proved by two witnesses. is sufficient to convict him of treason. Foster, 240. 244. But hasty unguarded confessions. made to persons having no such authority. ought not to be admitted as evidence under this statute. And indeed, even in cases of felony at the common law, they are the weakest and most suspicious of all testimony; ever liable to be obtained by artifice, false hopes, promises of favour, or menaces; seldom remembered accurately, or reported with due precision; and incapable in their nature of being disproved by other negative evidence. By the same stat. 7 W. 3. c. 3. it is declared that both witnesses must be to the same overt act of treason; or one to one overt act, and the other to another overt act of the same species of treason, and not of distinct heads or kinds: and no evidence shall be admitted to prove any overt act not expressly laid in the indictment. See 2 State Triuls, 144: Foster, 235. And therefore in Sir John Fenwick's case, in King William's time, where there was but one witness, an act of parliament (stat. 8 W. 3. c. 4.) was made on purpose to attaint him of treason, and he was executed. 5 State Trials, 40. But in all cases where the treason alleged is the assassination of the king, or any direct attempt against his life or his person, the prisoner is, by 39 and 40 G. 3. c. 93. to be tried upon the like evidence as if he stood charged with murder.

In every other accusation one positive witness is sufficient; except in cases of indictments for perjury, where one witness is not sufficient, because then there is only one oath against another. 10 Mod. 194.

2. From the reversal of Colonel Sydney's attainder by act of parliament in 1689 (8 State Trials, 472.), it may be collected that the mere similitude of hand-writing in two papers shown to a jury, without other concurrent testimony, is no evidence that both were any other knowledge of the character of the hand-writing, furnishes no evidence. Peake, 40: 2 Carr. & P. 477. But a witness may form his opinion as to the genuineness of lead more or less strongly to the conclusion, the hand-writing to a document, by inspect- and care must be taken not to draw the coning other documents which are authentic. Roscoe, 69. And the jury may judge whether an instrument is of the hand-writing of the demonstration cannot be required or expected; party by comparing it with other documents in evidence in the cause which are undoubtedly of the party's hand-writing; but not with drawn by the unanimous judgment and condocuments only put in evidence for the pur-Rex v. Morgan, id. in notes.

All presumptive evidence of felony should be admitted cautiously: for the law holds that it is better that ten guilty persons escape, than that one innocent suffer. And Sir Matthew Hale, in particular, lays down two rules most prudent and necessary to be observed. 1. Never to convict a man for stealing the goods of a person unknown, merely because he will give no account how he came by them, unless an actual felony be proved of such goods: and 2. Never to convict any person of murder or manslaughter, till at least the body be found dead; on account of two instances he mentions, where persons were executed for the murder of others, who were then alive, but missing.

presumptions (which have been in general much too technically treated) is well explained and illustrated by an extract from the judgment of C. J. Abbot, in Rex v. Burdett, 4 B. & A. 161.

"A presumption of any fact is properly an inferring of that fact from other facts that are known: it is an act of reasoning; and much of human knowledge on all subjects is derived from this source. A fact must not be inferred without premises that will warrant the inference; but if no fact could be ascertained by inference in a court of law, very few offenders could be brought to justice. In a great portion of trials as they occur in practice, no direct proof that the party accused actually committed the crime is or can be given. The man who is charged with theft is rarely seen to break the house or take the goods: and in cases of murder it rarely happens that the eye of any witness sees the fatal blow struck, or the poisonous ingredient poured into the cup. In drawing an inference or a conclusion from facts proved, regard must always be had to the very of the truth, and the better information of nature of the particular case, and the facility the consciences of the jury and justices, there that appears to be afforded either of explana-shall be allowed to the party arraigned the tion or contradiction. At length, by just conclusion against him in the absence of stat. 7 W. 3. c. 3. the same measure of justice explanation or contradiction: but when such was established throughout all the realm, in proof has been given, and the nature of the cases of treason within the act: and it was

D. 1758: case is such as to admit of explanation or contradiction (if the conclusion to which the proof A comparison of hand-writings without tends be untrue), and the accused offers no explanation or contradiction, what can human reason do otherwise than adopt the conclusion to which the proof tends? The premises may clusion hastily; but in matters that regard the conduct of men, the certainty of mathematical and it is one of the peculiar advantages of our jurisprudence that the conclusion is to be science of twelve men conversant with the pose of comparison. 2 Moo. & Malk. 133: affairs and business of life, and who know that where reasonable doubt is entertained it is their duty to acquit, and not by the judgment of one or more lawyers, whose habits might be suspected of leading them to the indulgence of too much subtlety and refinement."

Lastly, it was an ancient and commonly received practice (1 State Trials, passim), that as counsel was not allowed to any prisoner accused of a capital crime, so neither should he be suffered to exculpate himself by the testimony of any witnesses. And therefore it deserves to be remembered to the honour of Mary I. that she first desired such evidence to be received in a court of justice. Afterwards the courts grew so heartily ashamed of a doctrine so unreasonable and oppressive, that a practice was gradually introduced of exam-The nature of presumptive evidence and of ining witnesses for the prisoner, but not upon oath. 2 Bulst. 147: Cro. Car. 292. The consequence of this still was, that the jury gave less credit to the prisoner's evidence than to that produced by the crown. Sir Edward Coke protests very strongly against this tyrannical practice, declaring that he never read in any act of parliament, book, case, or record, that in criminal cases the party accused shall not have witnesses sworn for him; and therefore there is not so much as scintilla juris against it. 3 Inst. 79. See also 2 Hal. P. C. 283. and his Summary, 264. And the House of Commons were so sensible of this absurdity, that in the bill for abolishing hostilities between England and Scotland (stat. 4 Jac. 1. c. 1.) when felonies committed by Englishmen in Scotland were ordered to be tried in one of the three northern counties, they insisted on a clause, and carried it, notwithstanding the efforts of both the crown and the House of Lords, against the practice in the courts of England, and the express law of Scotland, "That in all such trials for the better discoafterwards declared by stat. 1 Anne, st. 2. c. 9. minster, may be exemplified in the court that in all cases of treason and felony, all witnesses for the prisoner should be examined upon oath, in like manner as the witnesses 173. against him. 4 Comm. 356-360.

Also where a man is bound to do an act, the omission of which would be criminal, his performance of that act will be intended until the contrary appear. 3 East, 192: 2 M. & S. 558. But if a criminal act has once been proved, the law infers malice, and requires exculpatory evidence from the party. Thus in a case of homicide, on proof of the prisoner having killed the deceased, the law presumes malice, unless the former can justify or extenuate the deed. Fost. 256.

It is also a maxim of law that "omnia presumuntur rite et solemniter esse acta donec probetur in contrarium." Thus a man acting in a public office or capacity is presumed to have been duly appointed. 3 Camp. 432.

Persons once in being shall be intended still living, if the contrary is not proved. 2 Rol. Rep. 461. Hearsay evidence is in some instances admissible originally, and without any proof of the failure of better proof. Thus reputation is sufficient evidence of marriage, although the party adducing it seeks to recover, as heir-at-law, to a deceased brother, and his parents are still living. 4 Bing. 267.
Besides questions of prescription and pedi-

Lex Constitutionis,

On account of the authority and dignity of the Court of Exchequer, anciently it was held other of the king's ordinary courts of justice: records, wherein the records of the other courts at Westminster &c. were brought to be laid up in the treasury there. And writs of the Chancery were sometimes made forth at the Exchequer: writs of summons to assemble parliaments, &c. Ibid.

The Exchequer has been commonly held at Westminster, the usual place of the king's residence; but it hath been sometimes holden at other places, as the king pleased: as at Winchester, &c. And in the Exchequer there are reckoned seven courts; viz. the Court of Pleas; the Court of Accounts; the Court of Receipts; the Court of the Exchequer-Chamber (being the assembly of all the judges of England for difficult matters in law); the Court of Exchequer-Chamber, for Errors in the Court of Exchequer; for Errors in the King's Bench; and the Court of Equity in the Exchequer Chamber. 4 Inst. 119.

But according to the usual division for the dispatch of all common business, the Exchequer is divided into two parts: one whereof is conversant especially in the judicial hearing and deciding of causes pertaining to the prince's coffer's, anciently called Scaccarium Computorum; the other is the Receipt of the Exchequer, which is properly employed in the receiving and payment of money. And it has been observed, that about the time of the conor farms due to the king were generally ren- bound to pay him their first-fruits and annudered in provisions and necessaries for his al tenths. But the Chancery has of late years household; but in that reign the same were obtained a large share in this business. See changed into maney; and afterwards, in succeeding times, the crown revenue was changed or paid into the Exchequer, chiefly in gold and silver. Lex Constitutionis, p. 208.

But by the 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 99. sheriffs are no longer to account in the Exchequer, but their accounts are to be audited by the commissioners for auditing the public accounts. See tit. Sheriff. And by the same act the statutes requiring all fines, recognisances, &c. to be certified and estreated twice a year into the Exchequer are repealed, and the same are to be transmitted to the lord high treasurer, or to the commissioners of the treasury, and a duplicate thereof to the commissioners for auditing the public accounts. See tit. Recognisance.

The Court of Exchequer is inferior in rank not only to the Court of King's Bench, but to the Common Pleas also; it is a very ancient court of record, set up by William the Conqueror as a part of the aula Regia, though requeror as a part of the aula Regia, though rethings, at any time depending in the said gulated and reduced to its present order by Court of Exchequer, as a court of equity; and King Edward I., and intended principally to if the chief baron should, from illness, &c. be order the revenues of the crown, and to recov- prevented from sitting for those purposes, his er the king's debts and duties. 4 Inst. 103-116. Bulst. 146. THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER IN Scotland was established in its present form by stat. 6 Anne, c. 26. The judges by that act are declared to be the high treasurer of Great Britain, with a chief baron and other four barons, chosen from the serjeants at law, or English barristers, or Scotch advocates of five years standing. This court has a peculiar jurisdiction in the customs and excise, and in all revenue matters, and in all forfeitures and penalties arising to the crown. The judges of this court are also commissioned to pass signatures authorising charters and gifts by the

from the common law side of the Court of land imposition paid sometimes on the consumption of the commodity, or frequently upon the retail sail, which is the last stage before the consumption.

This is doubtless (says Blackstone, 1 Comm. 318.), impartially speaking, the most economical way of taxing the subject; the charges of levying, collecting, and managing the excise duties being considerably less in proportion than in other branches of the revenue. also renders the commodity cheaper to the consumer than charging it with customs to time, the rigour and arbitrary proceedings of mon Pleas, and Exchequer, shall hereafter be excise laws seem hardly compatible with the temper of a free nation. For the frauds that might be committed in this branch of the revenue, unless a strict watch is kept, make it necessary wherever it is established, to give the officers a power of entering and searching the houses of such as deal in exciseable commodities, at any hour of the day; and in many cases of the night likewise. And (for the same reasons) the proceedings in case of transgressions are summary and sudden, to the exclusion of the trial by jury.

Its original establishment was in 1643, when it was introduced by the parliament then in rebellion against King Charles I. Its progress was gradual, being at first laid upon those persons and commodities where it was supposed the hardship would be least perceivable; viz. the makers and venders of beer, ale, cyder, and perry; and was afterwards imposed on such a multitude of commodities, that it might fairly be denominated general.

Upon the restoration of Charles II., it having then been long established, and its produce well known, some part of it was given to the crown, by way of purchase for the feodal tenures and other oppressive parts of the hereditary revenue. And notwithstanding the objections eternally raised against it by the interested or the patriotic, it has from time to time been imposed on a vast variety of articles.

It has been very judiciously observed that the grievances of the excise exist more, perhaps, in apprehension than reality. Actions and prosecutions against officers, commissioners, and justices, for misconduct in excise cases, are very rarely heard of in courts of law. It is certainly an evil that a fair dealer cannot have the benefit of any secret improvement in the management of his trade or manufactory; yet it seems more than equivalent to the public at large, that by the survey of the excise, the commodity is preserved from many shameful adulterations, as experience has fully proved since wine was made subject to the excise laws.

By the 7 and 8 G. 4. c. 53. the laws relating to the collection and management of the revenue of excise were consolidated and amended.

§ 15. The commissioners in Edinburgh and Dublin shall appoint under their hands and seals such persons as they shall think needful, in each market-town throughout the United Kingdom, and in certain towns in Anglesea, to hold in some known and public place offices of excise, for receiving entries and duties, and performing all other things touching the revenue of excise.

§ 16. The chief office in London, and the offices in Edinburgh and Dublin, are to be kept open, except on certain hollidays, from 8 in the morning till 3 in the afternoon; and the offices in every other place from 8 till 2.

The Kingdom of England and Wales (exclusive of the bills of mortality) is divided into about 50 collections; some called by names of particular counties; others by the names of great towns. Where one county is divided into several collections, or where a collection comprehends the contiguous parts of several counties, every collection is subdivided into several districts, within which there is a supervisor; and each district is parcelled into out-rides and foot-walks, within each of which there is a gauger, or surveying-officer. Gilb. Exch. Append.

He who would be made a gauger, must procure a certificate that he is above 21, and under 30 years of age; that he understands the four first rules of arithmetic; that he is of the communion of the church of England; how he has been employed, or what business he hath followed; that he is not incumbered with debts; whether single or married; and if married, how many children he has, for if he has above two, he cannot (by the rules of the office) be admitted. The business of the supervisor is to be continually surveying the houses and places of the persons within his district liable to duties: and to observe and see whether the officers duly make their surveys, and make due entries thereof in their books and in their specimen papers; and every supervisor is in his own book to enter what he himself does each day and part thereof; and also set down the behaviour, good and bad, the diligence or negligence of the several officers of his district: and at the end of every six weeks to draw out a diary of every day's business, and of the remarks made each day of the several officers in his district, and to transmit such diary at the end of every six weeks to the chief office. Each commissioner takes and peruses a proportion of these diaries, and when he meets with any remarkable complaint against any officer, he communicates it to the rest, who thereupon come to an agreement, either to admonish, reprimand, reduce or discharge. For small faults, officers are admonished; for great ones reprimanded; for greater, reduced; but for the greatest, discharged. The commissioner who peruses the diary writes in the margin, admonish, reprimand, or as the case is. Gilb. Exch. Append.

These diaries, after having been thus written upon are delivered to the clerk of the diaries, who in a book, called the reprimand book, places the admonitions, reprimands, and the like, to each officer's account, and writes every offender word thereof. Which reprimand book is resorted to upon discovering new faults; and if it is there found that the officer has before been admonished and reprimanded so often that there are no hopes of his amending, he is then discharged, The said book is likewise resorted to when application is made for advancing or preferring an officer into a better Frequent admonitions or reprimands post. In some instances discharged officers, after having for a competent time been thereby kept out of pay, are again restored; but if twice discharged, are never again restored, unless one of the discharges appears to have been occasioned by a misrepresentation of the case. EXCULPATION, Letters of. The warrant to an offender indicted for citing witnesses in his own defence. Scotch Dict.

Sir Edward Coke, in his Reports, makes two sorts of executions; one final, another with a quousque, tending to an end: an execution final is that which makes money of the defendant's goods, or extends his lands, and delivers them to the plaintiff, which he accepts in satisfaction, and is the end of the suit, and all that the king's writ requires to be done: the other writ with a quousque, though it tendeth to an end, is not final; as in case of a capias ad satisfaciendum, which is not a final execution, but the body of the party is to be taken, to the intent the plaintiff be satisfied his debt, &c., and the imprisonment of the defendant not being absolute, but until he do satisfy the same. 6 Rep. 87.

EXECUTION, in the usual legal sense of the word, is a judicial writ grounded on the judgment of the court from whence it issues; and is supposed to be granted by the court at the request of the party at whose suit it is issued, to give him satisfaction on the judgment which he hath obtained; and therefore an execution cannot be sued out in one court upon a judgment obtained in another. 3. A third species of execution is by writ of levari facias, which effects a man's goods and the profits of his lands, by commanding the sheriff to levy the plaintiff's debt on the lands and goods of the defendant; whereby the sheriff may seize all his goods, and receive the rent and profits of his lands, till satisfaction be made to the plaintiff. Finch, L. 471. Little use is now made of this writ; the remedy by elegit, which takes possession of the lands themselves, being much more effectual. But a species of this levari facias may be considered a writ of execution proper only to ecclesiastics, which is given when the sheriff upon If a ca sa. is sued out, and a non est inventus a writ of execution sued, returns that the deIn this case a writ goes to the bishop of the lupon forfeiture of these the body, lands, and diocese, in the nature of a levari or fieri facias, to levy the debt and damages de bonis ecclesiasticis, which are not to be touched by lay hands: and thereupon the bishop sends out a sequestration of the profits of the clerk's benefice, directed to the church wardens to collect the same, and pay them to the plaintiff till the full sum be raised. Reg. Orig. 300: Burn, E. L. 329: 2 Inst. 472: Jenk. 207. See further, tit. Levari Facias.

4. The fourth species of execution is by the writ of elegit, which is a judicial writ given by stat. W. 2; 13 Ed. 1. c. 18. either upon judgment for a debt or damages, or upon the forfeiture of a recognisance taken in the king's court. By the common law a man could only have satisfaction of goods, chattels, and the present profits of lands, by the two writs of execution last-mentioned (2 and 3), but not the possession of the lands themselves, which was a natural consequence of the fcodal principles prohibiting alienation of lands. See this Dict. tit. Tenure.

It is upon feodal principles, also, that copyhold lands are not liable to be taken in execution upon a judgment. 1 Rol. Ab. 888. But in case of a debt to the king, it appears by Magna Charta, c. 8. that it was allowed by the common law for him to take possession of the and chattels are not sold, but only appraised; and all of them, except oxen and beasts of the plough, are delivered to the plaintiff at such which enables the Court of Exchequer, on apreasonable appraisement and price, in part of satisfaction of his debt. If the goods are not sufficient, then the moiety, or one half of his and of the heirs and assigns of such debtor, in freehold lands, which he had at the time of any lands extended, to be sold as the court the judgment given, whether held in his own shall direct; the conveyance to be made by name, or any other in trust for him, are also to the remembrancer of the court, by bargain be delivered to the plaintiff, to hold till out of the rents and profits thereof the debt be levied, or till the defendant's interest be expired; as till the death of the defendant, if he be tenant for life, or in tail. 2 Inst. 395: stat. 29 Car.

This execution, or seizing of lands by elegit is of so high a nature, that after it the body of the defendant cannot be taken: but if execution can only be had of the goods because there are no lands, and such goods are not sufficient to pay the debt, a ca. sa. may then be had after the elegit; for such elegit is in this case no more in effect than a fieri facias. Hob. 58. See tit. Elegit.

Thus it appears that body and goods may be taken in execution; or land and goods; but not body and land upon any judgment between subject and subject, in the course of the common law; but

The process hereon is usually called an extent or extendi facias; because the sheriff is to cause the lands, &c. to be appraised to their full extended value, before he delivers them to the plaintiff, that it may be certainly known how soon the debt will be satisfied. But if the defendant had been tied up by an injunction out of Chancery for a year, yet he cannot take out execution without a scire facias, because the courts of law do not take notice of Chancery injunctions as they do of writs of error; besides in that case it had been no breach of the injunction to have taken out the execution within the year, and continued it down by vic' non misit breve, which cannot be done in the case of a writ of error, because that removes the record out of the court where the judgment was; and therefore there can be no proceedings below till it be affirmed, and returned to the inferior courts. 1 Salk. 322: 6 Mod. 288. 2. Of the Offence of obstructing Executions. -There were anciently castles, fortresses, and liberties, where they resisted the sheriff in executing the king's writs, which creating great inconvenience, the statute of Westm. 2. c. 39. (13 Ed. 1.) hindered the sheriff from returning rescuers to the king's writ of execution, and directed him to take the posse comitatus. See the stat. and 2 New Abr. 368.

The judges construed the words of the statute to extend only to executions, and not to writs on mesne process; that the sheriff was not obliged to carry the posse comitatus where the man was bailable, for they did not presume that in such cases the king's writ would be disobeyed. 2 New Abr. 368.

The original of commitment for contempts seems to be derived from this statute; for since the sheriff was to commit those who resisted the process, the judges who awarded such process must have the same authority to vindicate it; hence, if any one offers any contempt to his process, either by word or deed, he is subject to imprisonment during pleasure, viz. from whence they shall not be delivered without the king's special commandment. 2 New Abr. 368. Execution of Criminals, must in all cases, as well capital as otherwise, be performed by the sheriff or his deputy; whose warrant for so doing was anciently by precept under the hand and seal of the judge, as is still practised in the court of the lord high steward upon the execution of a peer. 2 Hale, 409: Co. P. c. 31. Though in the court of the peers in parliament it is done by writ from the king; afterwards it was established, that in case of life, before justices of gaol delivery or commissioners of oyer and terminer, the judges may command execution to be done without any writ. In the case of Ferrers, it was resolved, by all the judges, that if a peer convicted of murder before the lords in parliament, and the day appointed by them for execution pursuant to the statute should elapse before such execution or decree, a new time may be appointed for the execution, either by the high court of parliament before which such peer shall have been attainted, or by K. B., the parliament not sitting, the record of attainder being properly removed into that court. Fost. C. L. 140.

And the Court of K. B. may command execution to be done in all cases without any other writ or warrant but an award of the court upon the judgment. 2 Hale's Hist.

It is held by Coke (3 Inst. 52.) and Hale (2 H. P. C. 272. 412.) that even the king cannot change the punishment of the law, by altering hanging (or burning when used) into beheading; though, when beheading is part of the sentence, the king may remit the rest. And notwithstanding some examples to the contrary, Coke maintains that judicandum est legibus non exemplis. But others have thought, and more justly, that this prerogative being founded in mercy, and immemorially exercised by the crown, is part of the common law. Fost. 270: F. N. B. 244. b.: 19 Rym. Fæd. 284. For hitherto, in every instance, all these exchanges have been far more merciful kinds of death; and how far this may also fall within the king's power of granting conditional pardons (viz. by remitting a severer kind of death, on condition that the criminal submits to a milder), is a matter that may bear consideration. 4 Comm. 404. As the ordinary had thus the disposition of intestates' effects, the probate of wills, of course, followed; for it was thought just and natural that the will of the deceased should be proved to the satisfaction of the prelate, whose right of distributing his goods was superseded thereby.

By degrees, through an abuse of this power of the ordinary, often complained of before it was redressed, the Popish clergy secured the intestate's estate to themselves, without paying even his lawful debts; for which reason it was enacted by stat. On a sci. fac. against an executor, he cannot plead fully administered, but must plead specially that no goods of the testator came to his hands whereby he might discharge the debt; for he may have fully administered, and yet be liable to the debt, where goods of the testator's afterwards come to his hands. 1 Lil. 568: Cro. A preference, however, is given to specialty creditors out of equitable assets created by statute.

this subject is very ingeniously stated in a note of Mr. Cox's, to his edition of P. Wms. vol. 1. p. 550. But the question is settled by the fellowing act of the legislature.

By stat. 1 Will. 1, c. 10. " for making better provision for the disposal of the undisposed residues of the effects of testators," reciting "that testators by their wills frequently appoint executors, without making any express disposition of the residue of their personal estate; and that executors so appointed become by law entitled to the whole residue of such estate; and that courts of equity have so far followed the law, as to hold such exeentors entitled to retain such residue for their own use, unless it appears to have been their testator's intention to exclude them from the beneficial interest therein; in which case they are held to be trustees for the person or persons (if any) who would be entitled to such estate under the statute of Distributions, if the testator had died intestate." And "that it is desirable that the law should be extended in that respect." It is enacted, that where any person shall die (after 1st September, 1830), having by will or codicil appointed any exeeutor or executors, such executors shall be deemed by courts of equity to be trustees for the person or persons (if any) who would be entitled to the estate under the statute of Distributions, in respect of any residue not expressly disposed of, unless it shall appear by the will or codicil that the persons so appointed executors were intended to take such residue beneficially. There is a proviso, that the act shall not affect the rights of executors, statute. land.

It is a curious circumstance, that about 100 years since, a bill was brought into the House of Lords, for a purpose directly contrary, namely, to take away the equitable rule, and to give the surplus to the executor, whenever it was not precisely given away from him. A copy of this bill, introduced by Lord King in 1776, is given in Jemmett's edition of the acts passed in the session 1830, relating

Concerning the Administrator also there was formerly much debate, whether or no he could be compelled to make any distribution of the intestate's estate. Godol. p. 2. c. 32. But these controversies were put an end to by the statute commonly called the Statute of Distribution, 22 & 23 Car. 2. c. 10. (explained by 29 Car. 2. c. 30.) whereby it is enacted that the surplusage of intestates, (except of femes coverts, which are left as at common law: stat. 29. Car. 2. c. 3. § 25.) shall, after the expiration of one full year from the death of the intestate, be distributed in the following manner: one-third shall go to the widow of the intestate, and the residue, in equal proportions, to his children, or if dead, to their representatives, that is, their lineal descendants: if there are no children or legal representatives subsisting, then a moiety shall go to the widow, and a moiety to the next of kindred in equal degree, and their representatives: if no widow, the whole shall go to the children; if neither widow nor children, the whole shall be distributed among the next of kin in equal degree, and their representatives: but no representatives are admitted among collaterals farther than the children of the intestate's brothers and sisters. Raym. 496: Lord Raym. 571.

The next of kindred here referred to are to be investigated by the rules of consanguinity, as those who are entitled to letters of administration, of whom sufficient has already been said (ante III.) And therefore, by this statute, the mother, as well as the father, succeeded to all the personal effects of their children, who died intestate, and without wife or issue; in exclusion of any brothers and sisters of the deceased. And so the law still remains with respect to the father. (See 1 P. Wms. 48.) And the father need not administer. (Pr. Ch. 260.) But by stat. 1 Jac. 2. c. 17. if the father be dead, and any of the children die intestate, without wife or issue, in the surviving brother. Yet if C. had also been the life-time of the mother, she and each of the remaining children, or their representatives, shall divide his effects in equal portions. -And in case a man die, leaving a wife and a mother, and brothers and sisters, the wife shall have only a moiety, the remainder going to his mother, brothers, and sisters equally. 2

The act does not extend to Scot- English law previous to the statute of wills, by which (see Glanvil, l. 2. c. 5: Bracton, l. 2. c. 26: Fleta, l. 2. c. 57.) a man's goods were to be divided into three equal parts; of which one went to his heirs or lineal descendants, another to his wife, and the third was at his own disposal; or if he died without a wife, he might then dispose of one moiety, and the other went to his children. And so if he had no children the wife was entitled to one moiety, and he might bequeath the other; but if he died without either wife or issue, the whole was at his own disposal. The shares of the wife and children were called their reasonable parts; and the writ de rationabili parte bonorum was given to recover them. F. N. B. 122.

By the same Statute of Distributions it is directed that no child of the intestate (except his heir at law) on whom he settled in his life-time any estate in lands, or pecuniary portion, equal to the distributive shares of the other children, shall have any part of the surplusage with their brothers and sisters; but if the estates so given them, by way of advanceshares, the children, so advanced, shall have so much only as will make them equal. And this with respect to goods and chattels is part of the ancient custom of London, of the province of York, and of Scotland: and with regard to lands descending in coparcenary, that it hath always been, and still is, the common law of England under the name of Hotchpot.

It may be observed, that the doctrines and limits of representation, laid down in the Statute of Distribution, seem to have been in some measure also borrowed from the civil law: whereby it will sometimes happen, that personal estates are divided per capita, and sometimes per stirpes; whereas the common law knows no other rule of succession but that per stirpe; only. They are divided per capita, to every man an equal share, when all the claimants claim in their own rights, as in equal degree of kindred and not jure representationis, in the right of another person. As if the next of kin be the intestate's three brothers, A. B. and C., here his effects are divided into three equal portions, and distributed per capita, one to each: but if one of these brothers A. had been dead, leaving three children, and another, B. leaving two, then the distribution must have been per stirpes; viz. one third to A.'s three children, another third to B.'s two children, and a remaining to C. dead without issue, then A.'s and B.'s five children, being all in equal degree to the inestate, would take in their own rights per capita; viz. each of them one-fifth part. Prec.

A question has been made, if a father die intestate, leaving only one son, which son also dies intestate, whether administration should The Statute of Distribution bears, in its be granted to the next of kin, of the father or principle, a near resemblance to our ancient of the son? The latter determination has been that, by this statute, a right is vested in one child, the whole, two by the custom, and one by the where there is one and no more, (viz.) a right to sue for the estate: and by consequence, if he die before the estate is recovered, and ache be observed, that if the wife be provided for tually in his possession, it must go to his ad- by a jointure before marriage, in bar of her ministrator, and not to the administrator of the customary part, it puts her in a state of nonfather. 9. Distribution of the Customs of London and York as to Intestates .- The statute of Distribution expressly excepts and reserves the customs of the city of London, of the province of York, and of all other places having peculiar customs of distributing intestate's effects. So that, though in those places the restraint of devising is removed, their ancient customs remain in full force with respect to the estates of intestates.

In the city of London (Ld. Raym. 1329.) and province of York, (2 Burn. Eccl. Law. 746.) as well as in the kingdom of Scotland, (Ibid. 782.) and probably also in Wales, (concerning which there is little to be gathered, but from the stat. 7 & 8 W. 3. c. 38.) the effects of the intestate after payment of his debts, are in general divided according to the ancient universal doctrine of the pars rationabilis. If the deceased leaves a widow and children, his substance (deducting for the widow's her apparel, and the furniture of her bed-chamber, which in London is called the widow's chamber,) is divided into three parts, one of which belongs to the widow, another to the children, and the third to the administrator; if only a widow, or only children, they shall respectively, in either case, take one moiety and the administrator the other. 1 P. Wms. 341: Salk. 246. If neither widow nor child, the administrator shall have the whole. 2 Show. 175 .- And this portion, or dead man's part, the administrator was wont to apply to his own use. (2 Freem. 85: 1 Vern. 133.) Till the stut. 1 Jac. 2. c. 17. declared that the same should be subject to the statute of Distribution. So that if a man dies worth 1800l. personal estate, leaving a widow and two children, this estate shall be divided into eighteen parts; whereof the widow shall have eight, six by the custom, and two by the statute; and each of the children five, three by the custom, and two by the statute; if he leaves a widow and one child, she shall have specific goods, &c.; Sir Wm. Jones, 173: 1 still eight parts, as before, and the child Saund. 217. n. (1); or in case they are sold, an shall have ten, six by the custom and four action for money had and received to recover by the statute; if he leaves a widow and no their value.

that, by this statute of distribution of intestichild, the widow shall have three-fourths of entity, with regard to the custom only; (2 Vern. 665: 3 P. Wms. 16.) but she shall be entitled to her share of the dead man's part under the Statute of Distribution, unless barred by special agreement. 1 Vern. 15: 2 Chanc. Rep. 252. And if any of the children are advanced by the father in their life-time with any sums of money (not amounting to their full proportionale part), they shall bring that portion into hotchpot with the rest of the brothers and sisters, but not by the widow, before they are entitled to any benefit under the custom; (2 Freem. 279: 1 Equ. Cas. Abr. 155: 2 P. Wms. 526.) but if they are fully advanced, the custom entitles them to no farther dividend. 2 P. Wms. 527.

Thus far, in the main, the customs of London and of York agree: but besides certain other less material variations, there are two principal points in which they considerably differ. One is, that in London the share of the children (or orphanage part) is not fully vested in them till the age of twenty-one, before which they cannot dispose of it by testament (2 Vern. 558.); and if they die under that age, whether sole or married, their share shall survive to the other children; but after the age of twenty-one it is free from any orphanage custom; and in case of intestacy, shall fall under the Statute of Distributions. Prac. Chanc. 537. The other, that in the province of York, the heir at common law, who inherits any land, either in fee or in tail, is excluded from any filial portion or reasonable part. 2 Burr. 754. See further Williams on Executors, p. 937.

VI. 1. Of Actions and Suits by and against Executors and Administrators, &c .- And herein of Devastavit.-With respect to personal actions founded upon any obligation, contract, debt, covenant, or other duty, it has been a general rule from the earliest times that the right of action on which the deceased might have sued survives him, and vests in his executor or administrator. Executors however could not maintain an action of account at common law, but it was given to them by the stat. of Westm. 2 (1 Ed. 1. stat. 1. c. 3.); to executors of executors by 25 Ed. 3. c. 5; and to administrators by the 31 Ed. 3. c. 11. The remedy afforded by this statute was extended to executors of executors by the 25 E. 3. c. 5, and to administrators by an equitable construction of the former act, Cro. Eliz. 384. The 4 E. 3. being a remedial law, was expounded largely, and though it made use of the word tres-passes only, it was held that under it an executor or administrator should have the same cutor or administrator should have the same who has no right till administration commit-actions for any injury done to the personal ted; for his right is the same before as af-estate of the deceased during his life, whereby the probate of the will, and the not proving it had been rendered less beneficial to his reit is only an impediment to the action. EXECUTORY DEVISE. The devise of a fu-ture interest. A devise that vests not at the death of the testator, but depends on some contingency which must happen before it can vest. 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 486.

An executory devise differs from a remainder in three very material points. 1. That it needs not any particular estate to support it. 2. That by it a fee-simple or other less estate may be limited after a fee-simple. 3. That by this means a remainder may be limited of a chattel interest, after a particular estate for life created in the same. See tit. Remainder, and 2 Comm. 172-5.

1. The first case happens when a man devises a future estate to arise upon a contingency: and until that contingency happens does not dispose of the fee-simple, but leaves it to descend to his heir at law. As if one devises land to a feme-sole and her heirs, upon her day of marriage: here is in effect a contingent remainder without any particular estate to support it; a freehold commencing in future. This limitation, though it would be void in a deed, yet is good in a will, by way of executory devise. 1 Sid. 153. For, since by a devise a freehold may pass without corporal tradition or livery of seisin (as it must do if it passes at all), therefore it may commence in futuro; because the principal reason why it cannot commence in future in other cases, is the necessity of actual seisin, which always operates in præsenti. since it may thus commence in futuro, there der, by its unity with the particular estate, a present interest. And hence also it followed, that such an executory devise not being a present interest, could not be barred by a recovery suffered before it commenced. Cro. Jac. 593. See this Dict. tit. Fine and Recovery.

And this settled that such remainder may not be limited happens where a deviser devises his whole es- to take effect, unless upon such contingency tate in fee, but limits a remainder thereon to as must happen (if at all) during the life of the commence on a future contingency. See post, II. dies before the age of twenty-one, then to B. and his heirs: this remander also, though void in general, subsequent information may be in deed, is good by way of executory devise. thus divided. 2 Mod. 289.

In both these species of executory devises, the contingencies ought to be such as may happen within a reasonable time, as within one or more life or lives in being, or within a moderate term of years; for courts of justice will not indulge even wills, so as to create a perpetuity, which the law abhors. 12 Mod. 287: 1 Vern. 164: 1 Salk. 229. The utmost length that has been hitherto allowed for the contingency of an executory devise of either kind to happen in, is that of a life or lives in being, and one and twenty years afterwards. As when lands are devised to such unborn son of a feme-covert as shall first attain the age of twenty-one, and his heirs; the utmost length of time that can happen before the estate can vest, is the life of the mother and the subsequent infancy of her son, and this hath been decreed to be a good executory devise. Forr. 232. happen. Raym. 28: 1 Lutw. 798. Where a This limit was taken from the time in which an estate may be rendered unalienable by a strict settlement. An executory devise to an unborn son of a man, may be suspended a few months beyond the life of the father, and twenty-one years afterwards, by a posthumous See post I. ad finem.

3. By executory devise a term of years may be given to one man for his life, and afterwards limited over in remainder to another, which could not be done by deed: for, by law, the first grant of it to a man for life, was a total disposition of the whole term; a life estate being esteemed of a higher and larger nature than any term for years.

And, at first, the courts were tender even in the case of a will of restraining the devisee for life from aliening the term, but only held, that in case he died without exerting that act of ownership, the remainder over should then take place; for the restraint of the 592. Dyer, 358: 8 Rep. 96. Yet, in order to prevent the danger of perpetuities, it was settled, that though such remainders may be limited to as many persons successively as the devisor thinks proper, yet they must all be in esse during the life of the first devisee; for then, as it is expressed, all the candles are lighted, and are upon condition that if he did not pay the legaconsuming together, and the ultimate remain- cies given by the will within such a time that der is in reality only to that remainder-man then the land should remain to the legatees

tit. Remainder, II.

If a particular estate is limited, and the in-heritance passes out of the donor, this is a contingent remainder; but where the fee by a devise is vested in any person and to be vested in another by contingency, this is an executory devise: and in all cases of executory devises, the estates descend until the contingencies contingent estate limited, depends upon a freehold, which is capable of supporting a remainder, it shall never be construed an executory devise, but a remainder. And so it is if the estate be limited by words in præsenti, as when a person devises his lands to the heirs of A. B. who is living, &c. Though if the same were to the heir of A. after his death it would be as good as an executory devise. 2 Saund. 380: 4 Mod. 255.

One by will devises land to his mother for life, and after her death, to his brother in fee; provided, that if his wife, being then enceinte, be delivered of a son, then the land to remain to him in fee, and dies, and the son is born: in this case it was held, that the fee of the brother shall cease and vest in the son, by way of executory devise, on the happening of the contingency; and here such a fee estate enures as a new original devise to take effect when the first fails. EXIGENT, or exigi facias.] A judicial writ that lies where the defendant in an action personal cannot be found, nor any thing of his within the county, whereby to be attached or distrained; and is directed to the sheriff, to proclaim and call him five county-court days, one after another, charging him to appear upon pain of outlawry. It is called exigent, because it exacteth the party, i. e. requires his appearance or forthcoming to answer the law; and if he comes not at the last day's proclamation, he is said to be quinquies exactus (five times exacted), and is outlawed. EXILE. A banishment, or driving one away from his country. And this exile is either by restraint, when the government forbids a man, and makes it penal to return; or it is voluntary, where he leaves his country upon disgust, but may come back at pleasure. 2 Lev. 191.

One natural and regular consequence of personal liberty under the laws of England is, that every Englishman may claim a right to abide in his own country so long as he pleases, and is not to be driven from it unless by sentence of the law. Exile and transportation are both punishments unknown to the common law: and wherever the latter is inflicted, it is either by the choice of the criminal himself to escape a capital punishment, or by the express direction of some statute. See Magna Charta c. 29. which expressly declares that no freeman shall be banished unless by the judgment of his peers, or by the laws of the land. EXTENDI FACIAS, or EXTENT, extenta.] Is a writ of execution against the body, lands, or goods, or the lands and goods, or the lands only, of the debtor; and it is either for the king or the subject. For the former it is an ancient prerogative writ for obtaining satisfaction of debts originally due or assigned to the crown, or found on an inquisition taken on a writ of extent, or diem clausit extimate or valuation of lands, which, when made to the utmost value, is said to be the full extent; whence come our extended rents, or rack rents.

II. Of Extents in Aid. III. Of the Return of Writs of Extent in Chief and in Aid, and the subsequent Proceedings.

IV. Of the Writ of Extent at the Suit of a Subject, and other matters relating to Extents.

I. Of Extents in Chief .- The writ of extent at the suit of the king is either in chief or in aid. An extent in chief is an adverse proceeding by the king for the recovery of his own debt; an extent in aid is sued out at the instance and for the benefit of the debtor to the crown, or his surety, for the recovery of a debt due to himself. In the former case the king is the real as well as the nominal plaintiff; in the latter he is the nominal plaintiff only.

The king's remedy for the recovery of specialty debts is governed by the 33 H. S. c. 39; and on this statute he may proceed either by scire facias, which is the ordinary mode of proceeding when the debt is doubtful, or the debtor solvent, in which case an extent is the

which he acts.

Goods remitted to a factor ought to be carefully preserved; and he is accountable for all lawful goods which shall come to his hands; yet if the factor buy goods for his principal, and they receive damage after in his possession, though no negligence of his, the principal shall bear the loss; and if a factor be robbed, he shall be discharged in account brought against him by his principal. 4 Rep. 83. Lex Mercat: Mal. 81 : Str. 1178.

If the factor has orders from his principal not to sell any goods but in such a manner, and breaks those orders, he is liable to the loss or damage that shall be received thereby: and where any goods are brought or exchanged without orders, it is at the merchant's courtesy whether he will accept of them, or turn them on his factor's hands. When a factor has bought or sold goods pursuant to orders, he is immediately to give advice of it to his principal, lest the former orders should be contradicted before the time of his giving notice, whereby his reputation might possibly suffer: and where a factor has made a considerable profit for his principal. He must take due care in the disposition of the same; for without commission or particular orders he is answerable. A factor shall suffer for not observing orders; and no factor acting for another man's account in merchandize, can justify receding from the orders of his principal, though there may be a probability of advantage by it:

A bare commission to a factor to sell and dispose of merchandize, is not sufficient power for the factor to entrust any person, or to give a further day of payment than the day of the sale of the goods; for in this case, on the delivery of the one he ought to receive the other: and by the general power of doing as if it were his own, he may not trust an unreasonable time, viz. beyond one or three months, &c. the usual time allowed for the commodities disposed of; if he doth, he shall be answerable to his principal out of his own estate. 1 Bulst. 102. FACTORIES. The employment of young persons and children in mills and factories is now regulated by the 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 103 (explained by 4 W. 4. c. 1.); the leading provisions of which may be thus shortly stated.

The employment of children under nine years of age, after the 1st of January, 1834, is prohibited, except in silk mills. No child is to be employed more than 48 hours in one week, or more than nine hours in one day, who, six calendar months after the passing of act, has not attained 11, 18 months after, 12, or 30 months after, 13 years of age, except in silk mills, where children under 13 may work 10 hours every working day. No person under 18 is to work in the night between halfpast 8 in the evening and half-past 5 in the morning; or more than 12 hours a day, or more than 69 hours a week, except in certain cases mentioned in the act; and every such person is to have one hour and a half for meals.

No child under 13 is to be employed without a certificate from a surgeon as to its strength and appearance, countersigned by an inspector or justice; and no person above that age, ander 18, is to work more than 9 hours a day, or between 9 in the evening and 5 in the morning, without a certificate of age.

Children in factories are to attend schools for two hours at least for six days in the week to be witnessed by the school-master's vouch-

FACULTY, facultas.] As restrained from the original and active sense, to a particular understanding in law, is used for a privilege, or special dispensation, granted to a man by favour and indulgence, to do that which by law he ought not to do. And for the granting of these there is an especial court under the Archbishop of Canterbury, called the Court of the Faculties; and the chief officer thereof the master of the Faculties; who has power by the stat. 25 H. 8. c. 21. to grant dispensations; as to marry persons without the banns first asked (and every diocesan may make the like grants), to ordain a deacon under age, for a son to succeed the father in his benefice, one to have two or more benefices incompatible, and for other purposes. And in this court are registered the certificates of bishops and noblemen granted to their chaplains, to qualify them for pluralities and non-residence. 4 Inst. 337. See tit. Chaplain. FAG. A knot or excrescency in cloth; and in this sense it was used in the statute 4 Ed. 4. c. 1. (which is now repealed by 3 G, 4. c. 41. §. 1.) The fag-end signifies that end of a piece of cloth or linen where the weaver ends his piece, and works up the worst part of his materials.

FAGGOT. A badge wore in the times of popery, by persons who had recanted and abjured what was then adjudged to be heresy: those were condemned not only to the penance of carrying a faggot, as an emblem of what they had merited, to such an appointed place of solemnity; but for a more durable mark of that no person can claim a fair or market, uninfamy, they were to have the sign of a faggot embroidered on the sleeve of their upper garment: and if this badge or faggot was at any time left off, it was often alleged as the sign of apostacy.

FALSE IMPRISONMENT.

FALSUM IMPRISONAMENTUM.] A trespass committed against a person, by arresting and imprisoning him without just cause, contrary to law; or where a man is unlawfully detained without legal process; it is also used for a writ which is brought for this trespass.

To constitute the injury of false imprisonment two points are necessary; the detention 396. of the person, and the unlawfulness of such detention. Every confinement of the person has been held to lie against a superior officer is an imprisonment, whether it be in a common prison, or in a private house, or in the stocks, or even by forcibly detaining one in the public streets. 2 Inst. 589. Unlawful or false imprisonment consists in such confinement or detention without sufficient authority; which authority may arise either from some process from the courts of justice, or from some warrant from a legal officer having power to commit, under his hand and seal, and expressing the cause of such commitment. 2 Inst. 46. See this Dict. tits. Arrest, Commitment, Constable. Such authority may also arise from some other special cause; warranted, for the necessity of the thing, either by common or statute law; as the arresting of a felon by a private person without warrant; the impressing of mariners for the public service; or the apprehending wagoners, (under stat. 13 G. 3. c. 78,) for misbehaviour in the public highways. False imprisonment may also arise by executing a lawful warrant or process at an unlawful time, as on a Sunday. See tits. Arrest, Sunday.

The means of removing the actual injury of false imprisonment are four-fold; by writs of mainprize; odio et atia; homine replegiando; and habeas corpus. See this Dict. under those titles. The remedy for a satisfaction for the injury is by action either of case or trespass: and therein the party shall recover damages for the injury he has received.

The distinction between the action of case and action of trespass for this injury is thus stated. Where the immediate act of imprisonment proceeds from the defendant, the action can only be trespass; but when the act of imprisonment by one person, is in consequence of information from another, there an action on the case is a proper remedy. Morgan v. Hughes, 2 Term Rep. K. B. 232.

The law with respect to fealty continues the same as when Lord Coke wrote (see 1 Inst. 686. in note); for it does not appear to be varied by stat. 12. C. 2. c. 24. or any other statute made since; but it is no longer the practice to exact the performance of fealty. In the case of copyholders it is become a thing of course on admitting them to enter a respite of fealty; but with respect to such as hold by other tenures it is never thought of. In Wood's Inst. 183. it is said that lessees for life or years ought to do fealty to their lords for the lands they hold. However, it may not be amiss to remember that the title to fealty still remains; that it is due from all tenants except tenants in frankalmoigne, and such as hold at will or by sufferance, and if required must be iterated at every change of the lord; it differing in this respect from homage, which, except in special cases, is only due once; that the receiving of it is at least attended with the advantage of preserving the memory of the tenures, which though perhaps sufficiently done in the case of copyholds by the admittances, and by the payment of fines and quit rents, and continual render of other services, may be very necessary in cases where fealty is the only service due; and lastly, that the law for compelling the performance of fealty has provided the remedy by distress, which is an inseparable incident to all services due by tenure, and in the case of fealty cannot, as it is said, be excessive. Fealty has likewise been divided into gene- | FEE, and FEE-SIMPLE.-Tenant in fee hold to him and his heirs for ever. Litt. c. 1.

> The word fee is sometimes used for the compass or circuit of a lordship or manor, as we say the lord of the fee, &c., as well as the particular estate of the tenant; and also for a perpetual right incorporeal; as to have the keeping of prisons, &c. in fee. Bract. Lib. 2. c. 5: Old Nat. Br. 41. And when a rent or annuity is granted to one and his heirs, it is a fee personal. Co. Lit. 1, 2.

The true meaning of the word fee (feodum) is the same with that of feud or fief, and in its original sense it is taken in contradistinction to allodium, which latter the writers on this subject define to be every man's own land which he possesseth merely in his own right, without owing any rent or service to any superior. This is property in its highest degree, and the owner thereof hath absolutum et directum dominum, and therefore is said to be seised thereof absolutely in dominico suo, in his own demesne. But feedum or fee, is that which is held of some superior on condition of rendering him service, in which superior the ultimate property of the land resides; and, therefore, Sir Henry Spelman (of Feuds, c. 1.) defines a feud or fee to be the right which the vassal or tenant hath in lands, to use the same, and take the profits thereof to him and his heirs, rendering to the lord his due service; the mere allodial propriety of the soil always remaining in the lord. This allodial property no subject in England has, it being a received, and now undeniable, principle in the law, that all the lands in England are holden mediately or immediately of the king. The king, therefore, only hath absolutum et directum dominium, but all subjects' lands are in the nature of feodum or fee, whether derived to them by descent from their ancestors, or purchased for a valuable consideration; for they cannot come to any man by either of those ways, unless accompanied with those feodal clogs which were laid upon the first feudatory when it was originally granted. A subject, therefore, hath only the usufruct and not the absolute property of the soil; or, as Sir Edward Coke expresses it (Co. Lit. 1.), he hath dominium utile, but not dominium directum; and hence it is, that in the most solemn acts of law we express the strongest and highest estate that any subject can have by these words-" he is seised thereof in his demesne as of fee." It is a man's demesne, dominicum, or property, since it belongs to him and his heirs for ever, yet this dominicum, property, or demesne, is strictly not absolute or allodial, but the nativity of St. John the Baptist, of St. qualified or feedal; it is his demesne as of fee, Michael the Archangel, and of St. Thomas the that is, it is not purely and simply his own, Apostle, (or in lieu of the last, the birth of our since it is held of a superior lord, in whom the

A fee, therefore, in general signifies an estate of inheritance, being the highest and most extensive interest that a man can have in a foul, and when the term is used simply, without any other adjunct, or has the ac unct of sample annexed to it (as a fee or a fee smaller, it is used in contradistinction to a ice cone tional at the common law, or as a firstail tv the statute, imparting an absolute mnerdance, clear of any condition, limitation, or restrict tions to particular heirs, but descended to estate, gain a fee. II. The modes by which a fee, or any estate in real property may be acquired, are by law reduced to two,-descent and purchase, which word is here used in its legal sense, and not in its common acceptation. FEE-FARM RENTS OF THE CROWN. The fee-farm rents remaining to the kings of England from their ancient demesnes, were many of them alienated from the crown in the reign of King Charles II. By stats. 22 Car. 2. c. 6: 22 and 23 Car. 2. c. 24. (explained by stat. 10 Anne, c. 18.) the king was enabled by letters patent to grant fee-farm rents due in right of his crown, or in right of his duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall, except quit-rents, &c., to trustees to make sale thereof, and the trustees were to convey the same by bargain and sale to purchasers, &c., who may recover the same as the king might. But it has been observed, that men were so very doubtful of the title to alienations of this nature, that while these rents were exposed to sale for ready money, scarce any would deal for them, and they remained unsold; but what made men earnest to buy them was the stop upon some of his Majesty's other payments, which occasioned persons to resort to this as the most eligible in that conjuncture; no te nant in tail of any of the said rents is enabled to bar the remainder. And this fundamental maxim of the common law is confirmed by Westm. 1. c. 26. which enacts, "That no sheriff, or other king's officer, shall take any reward to do his office, but shall be paid of that which they take of the king; and that he who so doth shall yield twice as much, and shall be punished at the king's pleasure."

Also it is holden by Lord Coke, that within the words of the statute 34 Ed. 1. which are, " No tallage or aid shall be taken or levied by us or our heirs in our realm, without the good will and assent of archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other freemen of the land;" no new offices can be crected with new fees or old offices with new fees; for that is a tallage upon the subject, which cannot be done without common assent by act of parliament. 2 Inst. 533.

Yet it is holden, that an office erected for the public good, though no fee is annexed to it, is a good office; and that the party, for the labour and pains which he takes in executing it, may maintain a quantum meruit, if not as a fee, yet as a competent recompense for FEIGNED ISSUE. If, in a suit in equity, any matter of fact is strongly contested, the court usually directs the matter to be tried by a jury; especially such important facts as the validity of a will, or whether A. is the heir at law to B., or the existence of a modus decimandi, or real and immemorial compositions for tithes. But as a jury cannot be summoned to attend a court of equity, the fact is usually directed to be tried in the Court of King's Bench, or at the assizes, upon a feigned issue. For this purpose a feigned action is brought, wherein the pretended plaintiff declares that he laid a wager of 51. with the defendant, that A. was heir at law to B.; then he avers he is so, and brings his acwager, but avers that A. is not the heir to B., and thereupon that issue is joined, which is recovered from A. 6 Term Rep. FELONY.

FELONIA.] A term of law including, generally, all capital crimes below treason. Comm. 98. This word is of feudal original; but as to the derivation of which authors dif-Some deduce it, fancifully enough as it seems, from φμλος Gr. an impostor; from fallo, Lat. to deceive; and Coke (1 Inst. 391.) says it is crimen felleo animo perpetratum.-All, however, agree that it is such a crime as occasions a forfeiture of the offender's lands or goods: this, therefore, gives great probability to Spelman's derivation from the Teutonic or German fee, a feud or fief, and lon, price or value. Spelm. in verb. Felon. Felony according to this derivation, is then the same as pretium feudi; the consideration for which a man gives up his fief or estate; as in common speech it is said, such an act is as much as one's life or estate is worth. In this sense it will clearly signify the feodal forfeiture or rather the act by which an estate is forfeit. 556. ed or escheats to the lord. See 4 Comm. 95, for those felonies which where called clergya-ble, or to which the benefit of clergy extended, were anciently punished with death in lay or unlearned offenders, though afterwards by the statute law that punishment was for the first that day. offence universally remitted. See this Dict. tit. Clergy benefit of. Treason itself (says punishable with death shall be punished as di-Coke 3 Inst. 15.) was anciently comprised under the name of felony. And not only all of offence: and persons convicted of felony for fences now capital are in some degree or other which no punishment is or shall be specially death; as suicide, where the party is already dead; homicide, by chance medley, or in selfdefence: all which are, strictly speaking, felonies, as they subject the committers of them to forfeitures.

As felony may be without inflicting capital punishment, so it is possible that capital punishment may be inflicted for an offence which is no felony; as in case of heresy by the common law, which, though capital, never worked any forfeiture of lands or goods, an inseparable incident to felony. 3 Inst. 43. Of the same nature was the punishment of standing mute, which at common law was capital, but without any forfeiture, and was therefore no felony.

So that upon the whole the only adequate definition of felony seems to be this, viz. " An offence which occasions a total forfeiture, of either lands or goods, or both, at the common law; and to which capital or other punishments may be superadded, according to the degree of guilt." 4 Comm. 94, 95.

However, the idea of felony was so generally connected with that of capital punishment, that it seemed hard to separate them: and to this usuage the interpretations of law conformed. For if a statute made any new offence felony, the law implied that it should be punished with death (viz. by hanging), as well as by forfeiture, unless the offender pray the benefit of clergy. Hawk. P. C. i. c. 41. § 4. ii. c. 48. So where a statute decreed an offence to undergo judgment of life and member, the offence became a felony, though that precise word were omitted; but the words of the statute must not in such case have been the least doubtful or ambiguous. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 41. § 1, 2.

Also where a statute declared that the offender should, under the particular circumstances, be deemed to have feloniously committed any act, it made the offence a felony, and imposed all the common and ordinary consequences attending a felony. 3 M. & S.

Such was the law previous to the passing of the 7 & 8 G 4. c. 28., which by § 6. abol-Felony, in the general acceptance of law, sished benefit of clergy. The effect of this comprises every species of crime which occasioned, at common law, the forfeiture of lands or goods. All capital offences by the common law came generally under the title of felony; and could not be expressed by any word but felonice; which must of necessity be laid in an indictment of felony. Co. Lit. 391. It is always accompanied with an evil intention; and therefore felony cannot be imputed to any other motive. But the bare intention to commit a felony is so very criminal, that at the common law it was punishable as felony, where it missed of its effect through some accident; and now the party may be severely fined for such an intention. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 23.

Felony, by the common law, is against the life of a man; as murder, manslaughter, felo de se, se defendendo, &c. Against a man's goods, such as larceny, and robbery; against his habitation, as burglary, arson or houseburning; and against public justice, as breach FIERI FACIAS. A judicial writ of exe-, first writ, by reciting that all the money was cution, that lies where judgment is had for debt or damages recovered in the king's courts; by which writ the sheriff is commanded to levy the debt and damages of the goods and chattels of the defendant, &c. Old Nat. Br. 152. See this Dict. tit. Execu-

This writ and a levari capias were the only writs of execution at common law; except in actions of trespass, in which a capias ad satisfaciendum was allowed. It is called a fieri facias, because the words of the writ, directed to the sheriff, are quod fieri facias de bonis et catallis, &c., and from these words the writ takes it denomination. Co. Lit. 290. b.

This writ is to be sued out within a year and a day after judgment; or the judgment must be revived by scire facias: but if a fieri facias sued in time be not executed, a second fieri facias or elegit may be sued out; and it is said some years after, without a scire facias, provided continuances are entered from the first fi. fa., which it is also held may be entered after the second fi. fa. taken out, unless a rule is made that proceedings shall stay, &c. Sid. 59: 2 Nels. Abr. 776.

A fieri facias should regularly in the first instance issue and be directed to the sheriff of the county in which the venue in the action is laid; and after being returned by that sheriff, a testatum writ may then be sued out, direct-

As a fieri facias is a judicial writ, it must (except when issued on judgments obtained in writs of inquiry under 1 W. 4. sess. 2 c. 7. § 1. or for costs under the interpleader act, 1 and 2 W. 4. c. 58. § 7.) bear teste in term time; and the practice has hitherto been when sued out in term, to teste it on the first day of the term: if sued out in vacation, on the last day of the preceding term. A mistake in the teste may be amended. 2 Burr. 1188

If a man recover a debt against A. B., and levy part of it by fieri facias, and this writ is returned, yet he may take the body in execution by capias for the rest of the debt. Rol. Ab. 904. The sheriff on a fieri facias is to do his best endeavours to levy the money upon the goods and chattels of the defendant; and for that purpose to inquire after his goods, &c. And the plaintiff may ingire and search if he can find any, and give notice thereof to the sheriff, who ex officio is to take and sell them if he can, or if not, by a writ of venditioni exponas. 2 Shep. Abr. 111.

There may be a testatum fieri facias into another county, if the defendant hath not goods enough in the county where the action is laid to satisfy the execution; and the fieri facias for the ground of the testatum may be returned of course by the attorneys, as originals are. 2 Salk. 589. Ld. Raym. 849.

The sale or assignment by the sheriff of goods or chattels of the defendant taken in a fi. fa. conveys an indefeasible title to a bona fide vendee: so much so, that if the writ be afterwards vacated, the defendant shall not be restored to his goods. 1 M. & S. 425: 6 M. & S. 110. But if the writ were void, as issuing from a court not baving jurisdiction, or if the goods belong to a stranger, and not to the defendant, the sale would convey no property.

The defendant, instead of allowing the writ to be executed on his goods, may pay the debt and costs to the officer, which will be held a good payment to the plaintiff. 2 Lev. 203: Cro. El. 504. And the sheriff's duty on a fi. fa. differs from his duty on a ca. sa., for if he seise and sell the goods under the former after a tender of the debt and costs, he would, it FIFTEENTHS. A tribute or imposition of money, anciently laid generally upon cities, boroughs, &c. through the whole realm; so called, because it amounted to a fifteenth part of that which each city or town was valued at, or a fifteenth of every man's personal estate according to a reasonable valuation. every town knew what was a fifteenth part, which was always the same; whereas a subsidy raised on every particular man's lands or goods, was adjudged uncertain; and in that regard the fifteenth seems to have been a rate formerly laid upon every town, according to the land or circuit belonging to it. this Dict. tit. Recovery, for what relates ex- date the origin and frequent use of fines as clusively thereto.

A FINE, Finis, or Finalis Concordia: from the words with which it began, and also from its effect in putting a final end to all suits and contentions. A solemn amicable agreement or composition of a suit (whether that suit were real or fictitious), made between the demandant and tenant, with the consent of the judges; and enrolled among the records of the court where the suit was commenced; by which agreement freehold property might be transferred, settled, and limited. See Cruise on Fines, 1st ed. 4. 89. 92.

Shepherd says, sometimes it is taken for a "final agreement or conveyance upon record for the settling and securing of lands and tenements;" and so it is designated by some to be, "an acknowledgment, in the king's court, of the land or other things to be his right that doth complain:" and by others "a covenant made between parties and recorded by the justices:" and by others "a friendly, real, and final agreement amongst parties, concerning any land, or rent, or other thing whereof any suit or writ is hanging between them in any court:" and by others more fully " an instrument of record of an agreement concerning lands, tenements, or hereditaments; duly made by the king's license, and acknowledged by the parties to the same, upon a writ of covenant, writ of right, or such like, before the justices of the Common Pleas or others thereunto authorised, and engrossed of record in the same court; to end all controversies thereof, both between themselves which be parties and privies to the same, and all strangers not suing or claiming in due time." Shep. Touchst. c. 3. and the authorities there

The most distinguishable properties of a fine were, 1. The extinguishing dormant titles by barring strangers; unless they claimed within five years. 2. Barring the issue in tail immediately. [But not barring the remainders or reversions, which depend on the estate tail barred; except where the tenant in tail had the immediate reversion in fee in himself. See Cruise on Fines, 2d edit. 176: 1 Show. 370: 1 Salk. 338: 4 Mod. 1.] 3. Binding femes covert, see post. IV .- These constituted the peculiar qualities on account of which a fine was most usually, if not always resorted to, as one of the most valuable of the common assurances of the realm; being in fact a fictitious proceeding to transfer or secure real property by a mode more efficacious than ordinary conveyances. 1 Inst. 121. a. note

Fines being agreements solemnly made in the king's courts were deemed to be of equal notoriety with judgments in writs of right; and therefore the common law allowed them operation of each was not seldom necessary in to have the same quality of barring all who aid of the other. A fine was therefore often should not claim within a year and a day, levied for the purpose of eresting a good ten-See Plowd. 357. Hence we may probably ant to the præcipe, on which the Focovery was feigned proceedings. But this puissance of a fine was taken away by the 34 Ed. 3. c. 16. and this statute continued in force till the 1 Ric. 3. c. 7. and 4 H. 7. c. 24. which revived the ancient law, though with some change; proclamations being required to make fines more notorious, and the time for claiming being enlarged, from a year and a day to five years. See post, I. The force of fines on the rights of strangers being thus regulated, it became a common practice to levy them merely for better guarding a title against claims, which, under the common statutes of limitation, might subsist with a right of entry for 20 years and with a right of action for a much longer time. 1 Inst. ubi supra, and see post.

A RECOVERY-in its most extensive sense was a restitution to a former right by the solemn judgment of a court of justice. its general acception a common recovery was a judgment in a fictitious suit, brought against the tenant of the freehold, obtained in consequence of a default made by the person who was last vouched to warranty in such fictitious suit. Cruise on Recoveries, 1, 120. 121. 137.

The common recovery used for assurance of land was nothing else but fictio juris, or a certain form or course set down by law to be observed for the better assuring of lands and tenements to men, wherein there was a demandant who was called the recoverer, and a tenant who was called the recoveree; and one that was called (or vouched) to warrant upon a supposed warranty, who was called the vouchee. Shep. Touchst. c. 3. and the authorities there cited.

Considered as a legal assurance or conveyance, it was a fiction of law, adopted for the purpose of destroying that species of perpetuity which was created by the statute de donis (13 Ed. 1. st. 1. c. 1.); and whereby all tenants in tail were ennbled, by pursuing the proper form, to bar their estates-tail. 10 Rep. 37. And not only this, but it was also a bar to ALL remainders and reversions depending on such estates-tail so barred; and to all charges and incumbrances created by the persons in remainder and reversion. 1 Rep. 62. But a common recovery did not bar an executory devise unless the executory devisee came in as a vouchee. Fearne, 306: Pigot, 134: Cro. Jac. 590: Palm. 131.—And by stat. 12 H. 8. c. 15. no estate held by statute-merchant, staple, or elegit, should be avoided by means of a feigned recovery.—And see also this stat. and stat. of Gloucester, 1 Ed. 1. c. 11 as to termours

I. Under this head it will be necessary to explain, 1. The nature of a fine. 2. Its several kinds. 3. Its force and effect.

1. A fine was sometimes said to be a feoffment of record; Co. Lit. 50; though it might with more accuracy have been called an acknowledgment of a feoffment on record. By which is to be understood, that it had at least the same force and effect with a feoffment, in the conveying and assuring of lands; though it was one of those methods of transferring estates of freehold by the common law, in which livery of seisin was not necessary to be actually given, the supposition and acknowledgment thereof in a court of record, however fictitious, inducing an equal notoriety. But, more particularly, a fine may be described to have been an amicable composition or agreement of a suit, either actual or fictitious, by leave of the king or his justices; whereby the lands in question became, or were acknowledged to be, the right of one of the parties. Co. Lit. 120. In its original it was founded on an actual suit commenced at law for recovery of posession of the land or other hereditaments; and the possession thus gained by such composition was found to be so sure and effectual, that fictitious actions were commenced, for the sake of obtaining the same security.

Fines were of equal antiquity with the first rudiments of the law itself; being spoken of by Glanvil. l. 8. c. 1. and Bracton, l. 5. tr. 5. c. 28. in the reigns of Henry II. and Henry III. as things then well known and long established: and instances have been produced of them even prior to the Norman invasion. Plowd. 369. So that the stat. 18 Ed. 1. called modus

First, The party to whom the land was to or suit at law against the other, generally an action of covenant (though a fine might also have been levied on a writ of mesne, of wartiis; Finch L. 278.); by suing out a writ of præcipe, called a writ of covenant: the foundation of which was a supposed agreement or covenant, that the one should convey the lands Fine: and of Deeds to lead or de- to the other; on the breach of which agreement the action was brought. On this writ II. Of what Things a Fine might have been there was due to the king by ancient prerogative a primer fine, or a noble for every five marks of land sued for; that was, one-tenth of the annual value. 2 Inst. 511. The suit being thus commenced, then followed-

Secondly. The licentia concordandi, or leave to agree the suit: for, as soon as the action was brought, the defendant, knowing himself to be in the wrong, was supposed to make overtures of peace and accommodation to the plaintiff, who accepted them; but having, upon suing out the writ, given pledges to prosecute his suit, which he endangered if he deserted it without license, therefore applied to the court for leave to make the matter up. This leave was readily granted; but for it there was also another fine due to the king by his prerogative, which was an ancient revenue of the crown, and was called the king's silver, or sometimes the post fine, with respect to the primer fine before-mentioned. And it was as much as the primer fine, and half as much more, or ten shillings for every five marks of land; that is, three-twentieths of the supposed annual value. 5 Rep. 39: 2 Inst. 511: stat. 32 G. 2. c. 14.

Thirdly, came the concord, or agreement itself, after leave obtained from the court. This was usually an acknowledgment from the deforciants (or those who kept the other out of possession) that the lands in question were the right of the complainant. And from this acknowledgment, or recognition of right, the party levying the fine was called the cognizor, and he to whom it was levied the cognizee. This acknowledgment must have been made either openly in the Court of Common Pleas, or before the lord chief justice of that court, or else before one of the judges of that court; or two or more commissioners in the country, empowered by a special authority called a writ of dedimus potestatem; which judges and commissioners were bound by stat. 18. Ed. 1. st. 4. to take care that the cognizors were of full age, sound memory, and out of prison. If there were any feme covert among the cognizors, she was privately examined whether she did it willingly and freely, or by compulsion of her husband.

The concord being the complete fine, it was levandi fines, did not give them original, but adjudged a fine of that term in which the concord was made, and the writ of covenant re- | term, write out a table of the fines levied in turnable. 1 Salk. 341. A concord would not be of any thing but what was contained in the writ of covenant: and the note of the fine

Though one concord would serve for lands that lay in divers counties, yet there must have been several writs of covenant. 3 Inst. 21: Dyer, 227. A concord of fine might have had an exception of part of the things mentioned therein: and if more acres were named than a man had in the place, or were intended to be passed, no more should pass by the fine than were agreed upon. 1 Leon. 81: 3 Bulst. 317, 318.

By these acts all the essential parts of a fine were completed: and if the cognizor died the next moment after the fine was acknowledged, provided it were subsequent to the day on which the writ was made returnable, still the fine should be carried on in all its remaining parts. Comb. 71. Of which the next was-

The note of the fine; which was only an abstract of the writ of covenant, and the concord, naming the parties, the parcels of land, and the agreement: this must have been enrolled of record in the proper office, by direction of

The fifth part was the foot of the fine, or conclusion of it; which included the whole matter, reciting the parties, day, year, and place, and before whom it was acknowledged or levied. Of this there were indentures made or engrossed at the chirographer's office, and delivered to the cognizor and cognizee, usually beginning thus, "Hac est finalis concordia; This is the final agreement;" and then reciting the whole proceeding at length. thus the fine was completely levied at common law.

By several statutes, still more solemnities were superadded, in order to render the fine more universally public, and less liable to be levied by fraud or covin. And first, by stat. 27 Ed. 1. c. 1. the note of the fine was to be openly read in the Court of Common Pleas, at two several days in one week, and during such reading all pleas were to cease. By stat. 5 H. 4. c. 14: 23 Eliz. c. 3. all the proceedings on fines, either at the time of acknowledgment, or previous, or subsequent thereto, were to be enrolled of record in the Court of Common Pleas. By stat. 1 Ric. 3. c. 7. confirmed and enforced with some alterations by stat. H. 7. c. 24. (the latter act superseding the former), the fine, after engrossment, was to be openly read and proclaimed in court (during which all pleas should cease) sixteen times: viz. four times in the term in which it was made, and four times in each of the three succeeding terms; which was reduced to one in each term by stat. 31 Eliz. c. 2. and these proclamations were endorsed on the back of the record. It was also enacted by stat. 23 Eliz. c.

each county in that term, and affix them in some open part of the Court of Common Pleas all the next term, and also deliver the contents remaining with the chirographer, it was held, of such table to the sheriff of every county, who should at the next assizes fix the same in some open place in the court, for the more

2. Fines thus levied were of four kinds:-First. What, in law French was called a fine " sur cognizance de droit, come ceo que il ad de son done ;" or, a fine upon acknowledgment of the right of the cognizee, as that which he hath of the gift of the cognizor. This was the best and surest kind of fine, for thereby the deforciant, in order to keep his covenant with the plaintiff, of conveying to him the lands in question, and at the same time to avoid the formality of an actual feoffment and livery, acknowledged in court a former feoffment or gift in possession, to have been made by him to the plaintiff. This fine was therefore said to be a feoffment of record; the livery, thus acknowledged in court, being equivalent to an actual livery; so that this assurance was rather a confession of a former conveyance, than a conveyance thus originally made; for the deforciant, or cognizor, acknowledged the right to be in the plaintiff, or cognizee, as that which he had de son done of the proper gift of himself, the cog-

Secondly. A fine "sur cognizance de droit tantum," or, upon acknowledgment of the right merely; not with the circumstance of a preceding gift from the cognizor. This was commonly used to pass a reversionary interest, which was in the cognizor. For of such reversions there could be of feoffment, or donation with livery supposed; as the possession during the particular estate belonged to a third person. Moor, 629. It was worded in this manner, "that the cognizor acknowledges the right to be in the cognizee; and grants for himself and his heirs that the reversion, after the particular estate determines, shall go to the cognizee." West. Symb. p. 2. § 95.

Thirdly. A fine "sur concessit," was where the cognizor, in order to make an end of disputes, though he acknowledged no precedent right, yet granted to the cognizee an estate de novo, usually for life or years, by way of supposed composition. And this might be done reserving a rent, or the like; for it operated as a new grant. West. p. 2. § 66.

This species of fine might have been levied where the intent was to pass several mesne particular estates, and a reversion in fee (2 W. P. Taunt. 84;) but not of a doubtful estate under the description of "all and whatsoever the said ---- hath in the premises:" nor could two operations, as that of a fine sur concessit and one sur conusance de droit, be combined in the same fine. 2 W. P. Taunt. 198.

Fourthly. A fine, " sur done grant et ren-3. that the chirographer of fines should, every | der," was a double fine, comprehending the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, &c., and | were expressly declared not to be by the statthe fine sur concessit, and might have been ute de donis, the stat. 32 H. S. c. 36. was thereused to create particular limitations of estate: and this to persons who were strangers, or not declaring that a fine levied by any person of named in the writ of covenant; whereas the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, &c. conveyed nothing but an absolute estate, either of inheritance or at least of freehold. Salk. 340. In this last species of fine, the cognizee, after the right was acknowledged to be in him, granted back again or rendered to the cognizor, or perhaps to a stranger, some other estate in the premises. But, in general, the first species of fine, sur cognizance de droit come ceo, &c. was the most used; as it conveyed a clear and absolute freehold, and gave the cognizee a seisin in law, without any actual livery; and was therefore called a fine executed: whereas the others were but executory. See post, II. 3. The force and effect of a fine principally depended on the common law and the two statutes, 4 H. 7. c. 24. and 32 H. 8. c. 36. The cluded by the fine, and barred of any latent ancient common-law, with respect to this right they might have, even though under the point, was very forcibly declared by the stat. legal impediment of coverture. And indeed, 18 Ed. 1 st. 4. in these words, "And the reason why such solemnity is required in passing covert, or married woman, is permitted by law a fine is this, because the fine is so high a bar, and of so great force, and of a nature so powerful in itself, that it precludes not only those moved the general suspicion of compulsion by which are parties and privies to the fine, and her husband,) it was therefore the usual and their heirs, but all other persons in the world, almost the only safe method, whereby she who are of full age, out of prison, of sound could join in the sale, settlement, or incummemory, and within the four seas, the day of brance, of any estate. See post, IV. the fine levied: unless they put in their claim on the foot of the fine within a year and a day." But this doctrine of barring the right by nonclaim was abolished for a time by 34 Ed. 3. c. 16., which admitted persons to claim, and fal. sify a fine, at any indefinite distance, (Litt. \ dower (see Cruise, Piggot); yet if a jointress 441.;) whereby, as Sir Edward Coke observes (2 Inst. 581.,) great contention arose, and few men were sure of their possessions, till the parliament held in 4 H. 7. reformed that mischief, and excellently moderated between the latitude given by the statute, and the rigour of the common law. For the statute then made (stat. 4 H. 7. c. 241.) restored the doctrine of non-claim, but extended the time of claim. By that statute the right of all strangers whatsoever was barred, unless they made claim, by way of action or lawful entry, not within one year and a day, as by the common law, but within five years after proclamations made: except feme-coverts, infants, prisoners, persons beyond the seas, and such as were not of whole mind: who had five years allowed to them and their heirs, after the death of their husbands, their attaining full age, recovering their liberty, returning into England, or being restored to their right mind.

upon made; which removed all difficulties, by full age, to whom, or to whose ancestors, lands have been entailed, should be a perpetual bar to them and their heirs claiming by force of such entail: unless the fine were levied by a woman after the death of her husband, of lands which were, by the gift of him, or his ancestors, assigned to her in tail for her jointure; or of lands entailed by act of parliament or letters patent, and whereof the reversion belonged to the crown. See stat. 11 H. 7. c. 20.

From this view of the common law, regulated by these statutes, it appears that a fine was a solemn conveyance on record from the cognizor to the cognizee; and that the persons bound by a fine were Parties, Privies, and Strangers.

The parties were either the cognizors, or cognizees: and these were immediately conas this was almost the only act that a feme to do (and that because she was privately examined as to her voluntary consent, which re-

H. 7. c. 20. See post, III.

Privies to a fine were such as are any way related to the parties who levied the fine, and claimed under them by any right of blood, or other right of representation. Such were the heirs general of the cognizor; the issue in tail since the statute of H. 8; the vendee; the devisee; and all others who must have made title by the persons who levied the fine. For the act of the ancestor bound the heir, and the act of the principal his substitute, or such as claimed under any conveyance made by him subsequent to the fine so levied. 3 Rep. 87.

Strangers to a fine were all other persons in the world, except only parties and privies. And these were also bound by a fine, unless It seems to have been the intention, to have within five years after proclamation made been a bar of estates-tail. But doubts having arisen whether they could, by mere implication, be adjudged a sufficient bar, which they ture, infancy, imprisonment, insanity, and without proclamations; one waste processing. absence beyond sea; and persons who were tions was termed a fine according to the thus incapacitated to prosecute their rights, statutes 1 R. 3. c. 7: 4 H. 7. c. 24. Co. Lit. 372. And if within that time they neglected to claim, or (by the stat. 4 Anne, c. 16.) if they did not bring an action to try the right, within one year after making such claim, and prosecuted the same with effect, all persons whatsoever were barred of whatever right they might have had by force of the statute of non-claim. See this Dict. tit.

But, in order to make a fine of any avail at all, it was necessary that the parties should have some interest or estate in the lands to be affected by it. Else it were possible that two strangers by a mere confederacy might defraud the owners by levying fines of their lands; for if the attempt were discovered, they could be no sufferers, as to the estate in question, but remained in statu quo; whereas if a tenant for life levied a fine, it was an absolute forfeiture of his estate to the remainderman or reversioner, if claimed in proper time. Co. Lit. 251. It is not therefore to be supposed that such tenants would frequently run so great a hazard; but if they did, and the sion of the lands; for, if he were in possession claim was not duly made within five years at the time of levying the fine, there need not after their respective terms expired, the estate have been any such writ, or any execution of was for ever barred by it. 2 Lev. 52. Yet where a stranger, whose presumption could not thus be punished, officiously interfered in an estate which in nowise belonged to him, his fine was of no effect: and might at any time have been set aside (unless by such as were parties or privies thereunto) by pleading that "partes finis nihil habuerunt." And even if a tenant for years, who had only a chattel interest and no freehold in the land, levied a fine, it operated nothing, but was liable to be defeated by the same plea. 5 Rep. 123: Hard. 401. See post, VII. Therefore, when a lessee for years was disposed to levy a fine, it was usual for him to make a feoffment first, to displace the estate of the reversioner, and create a new freehold by disseisin. Hardr. 402: 2 Lev. 52. See this Dict. tit.

put the estate of another to the hazard, as far as in them lay, the 21 Jac. 1. c. 26. made it felony without the benefit of clergy to acknowledge, or procure to be acknowledged, any fine, recovery, judgment, &c., in the name of any person not privy or consenting to the same. And although that statute was repealed by the 1 W. 4. c. 66. the offence was by the latter act declared to be still a felony, and punishable by transportation, &c.

Fines were also divided into those with and \ 21.30. A

If tenant in tail levied a fine, and died before all the proclamations were made, though the right of the estate-tail descended upon the issue, immediately on the death of the ancestor, yet if proclamations were made afterwards, such right was barred by the fine, by the statutes 4 H. 7. c. 24: 3 H. 8. c. 36: 3 Rep. 84.

The fine without proclamations was called a fine at the common law, being levied in such manner as was used before the stat. 4 H. 7. c. 24. and was still of the like force by the common law, to discontinue the estate of the cognizor, if the fine were executed.

A fine also with or without proclamations was either executed or executory: a fine executed was such a fine as of its own force gave present possession to the cognisee, without any writ of seisin to enter on the lands, &c., as a fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo; and in some respects a fine sur release, &c. was said to be executed. A fine executory did not execute the possession in the cognisee, without entry or action, but required a writ of seisin; as the fine sur conuzance de droit tantum, &c. unless the party were in possesthe fine; and then the fine would enure by way of extinguishment of right, not altering the estate or possession of the cognisee, however it might better it. West. § 20.

Subsequent to the statute of uses (27 H. 8.) writs of possession were never sued out where fines were levied to uses; for the statute executing the possession to the use, the cognisee was immediately in possession without attornment. Booth, 250: Pig. 49: Cruise, 59.

Where husband and wife granted to trustees an estate, of which the wife's father was seised in fee-simple, and afterwards in the life of the father they levied a fine of the lands to the uses of the settlement, and the father afterwards died, leaving the wife one of his coheiresses, her moiety of the estate became subject to the uses of the settlement, by reason of the fine as an estoppel against the husband In order to punish criminally such as thus and wife and all persons claiming title under them. 2 B. & A. 240.

Fines were likewise single or double: single, where an estate was granted by the cognisor to the cognisee, and nothing was thereby rendered back again from the cognisee to the cognisor. The double fine was that which contained a grant or render back again from the cognisee, of the land itself; or of some rent, common, or other thing out of it, and by which remainders were limited, &c. FINES, FOR OFFENCES. Fine, in this sense, is amends, pecuniary punishment, or recompense for an offence committed against the king and his laws, or against the lord of a manor. In which case a man is said finem facere de transgressione cum rege, &c. Reg. Jud. f. 25. a. Cowell.

It seems that originally all punishments were corporal; but that after the use of money, when the profits of the courts arose from the money paid out of the civil causes, and the fines and confiscations in criminal ones, the commutation of punishments was allowed of, and the corporal punishment, which was only in terrorem, changed into pecuniary, whereby they found their own advantage.

This begat this distinction between the greater and the lesser offences; for in the crimina majora there was at least a fine to the king, which was levied by a capiatur; but upon the lessor offences there was only an amercement which was affeered, and for which a distringas, or action of debt, lay. 2 New

The discretionary fines (and discretionary length of imprisonment) which the courts of justice are enabled to impose, may seem an exception to the general rule, that the punishment of every offence is ascertained by the But the general nature of the punishment is in these, as in other cases, fixed and determinate; though the duration and quantity of each must frequently vary, from the aggravations, or otherwise, of the offence, the quality and condition of the parties, and from innumerable other circumstances.

The quantum in particular of pecuniary fines neither can nor ought to be ascertained by an invariable law. Our statute law, therefore, has not often ascertained the quantity of to any suit) it was then denominated a fine. fines, nor the common law ever; it directing certain offences to be punished by a fine in when any such fine was imposed, to inquire general, without specifying the certain sum by a jury quantum inde regi dare valeat per that however unlimited the power of the court For the provisions of the act relating solely may seem, it is far from being wholly arbihas particularly declared, that excessive fines ought not to be imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted; and the same statute further declares, that all grants and promises of fines and forfeitures of particular persons, before conviction, are illegal and void. Now the bill of rights was only declaratory of the old constitutional law; and accordingly we find it expressly holden, long before, that all such previous grants are void; since thereby many times, undue means, and more violent prosecution, would be used for private lucre, than the quiet and just proceeding of law would permit. 2 Inst. 48.

The reasonableness of fines in criminal cases has also been usually regulated by the determination of Magna Charta, c. 14. concerning amercements for misbehaviour by the suitors in matters of civil right. "Liber homo non amercietur pro parvo delicto, nisi se-cundum modum ipsius delicti, et pro magno delicto, secundum magnitudinem delicti; salvo contenemento suo: et mercator eodem modo, salva mercandisa; et villianus eodem modo amercietur, salvo wainagio suo." A rule that obtained even in Henry II.'s time (Glan. l. 9. cc. 8. 11.), and means only, that no man shall have a larger amercement imposed upon him than his circumstances or personal estate will bear: saving to the landholder his contenement or land; to the trader his merchandize; and to the countryman his wainage or team and instruments of husbandry. In order to ascertain which, the great charter also directs, that the amercement, which is always inflicted in general terms (sit in misericordia), shall be set, ponatur, or reduced to a certainty by the oath of good and lawful men of the neighbourhood. Which method, of liquidating the amercement of a precise sum, was usually performed in the superior courts by the assessment or affeerment of the coroner, a sworn officer chosen by the neighbourhood, under the equity of the stat. West, 1.c. 18; and then the judges estreated them into the Exchequer. F. N. B. 76. But in the courtleet and court-baron it is still performed by affeerors or suitors sworn to afferee, that is, tax and moderate the general amercement according to the particular circumstance of the offence and the offender: the affeeror's oath is conceived in the very terms of Magna Charta Fitz. Surv. c. 11. Amercements imposed by the superior courts on their own officers and ministers were affeered by the judges themselves; but when a pecuniary mulct was inflicted by them on a stranger (not being party And the ancient practice was, 8 Rep. 40.

Persons throwing or firing squibs, &c., or suffering them, &c. to be thrown or fired from their houses, incur a penalty of 20s. Likewise persons throwing, casting or firing, or aiding or assisting in the throwing, casting or firing of any squibs, rockets, serpents, or other fireworks, in or into any public street, house, or shop, river, highway, road or passage, incur the like penalty of 20s., and on non-payment may be committed to the house of correction. Stat. 9 and 10 W. 3. c. 7.

This statute does not take from any person injured, by throwing of squibs, &c. the remedy at common law; for the party may maintain a special action on the case or trespass, &c. for recovery of full damages. Sec. FIRST-FRUITS, Primitiæ.] The profits after avoidance of every spiritual living for the first year, according to the valuation thereof in the king's books. These were given in ancient times to the pope throughout all Christendom, and were first claimed by him in England of such foreigners as he bestowed benefices on here by way of provision; afterwards they were demanded of the clerks of all spiritual patrons, and at length of all other clerks on their admission to benefices; but upon the throwing off the popes' supremacy in the reign of Henry VIII. they were translated to, and vested in, the king, as appears by the stat. 26 H. 8. c. 3. and a new valor beneficiorum was then made, by which the clergy are at present This valor beneficiorum is what is commonly called, the king's books; a transcript of which is given in Ecton's Thesaurus and Bacon's Liber Regis. And for the ordering thereof, there was a court erected, 32 H. 8. but dissolved soon after. See Valor Ecclesiasticus.

Though by stat. 1. Eliz. c. 4. these profits are reduced again to the crown, yet the court was never restored; for all matters formerly handled therein, were transferred to the Exchequer, within the survey of which court

By stat. 26 H. 8. c. 3. (extended to Ireland by Irish act, 28 H. 8. c. 26.) the lord chancellor, bishops, &c. are empowered to examine into the value of every ecclesiastical benefice and preferment in their several dioceses; and clergymen entered on their livings before the first fruits are paid or compounded for, are to forfeit double value. But stat. 1 Eliz. c. 4. ordains, that if an incumbent on benefice do not live half a year, or is ousted before the year expire, his executors are to pay only a fourth part of the first fruits: and if he lives the year, and then dies, or be ousted in six months after, but half the first-fruits shall be paid; if a year and a half, three quarters of otherwise. The archbishops and bishops have injuring ponds and private fisheries, are refour years allowed for the payment, and shall pealed. pay one quarter every year, if they live so long upon the bishopric: other dignitaries in the church pay theirs in the same manner as rectors and vicars. Numerous statutes, commencing with the reign of Edward I., have been passed for the preservation of salmon and other fish in rivers. and regulating the size and time at which they, as well as sea-fish, may be taken. Many of the enactments are conflicting and obscure; and the law on the subject stands greatly in need of revision and consolidation. The following is a very general abridgment of some of the principal acts:—

By stat. 2 H. 6. c. 15. no person may fasten nets, &c. across rivers to destroy fish, and disturb passage of vessels, on pain of 51.

By stat. 1 Eliz. c. 17. Lit. 122. a. n. 7: Doug. 56. The better opinion, however, is, that although the right must have been originally derived from the owner of the soil, it may exist in a person having no interest therein; and one of the cases already quoted establishes, that by a grant or demise immediately from the owner of the soil, a several right of fishery may be created, and be declared on as such. 5 Burr. 2814.

Common of piscary or fishery is defined to be a liberty of fishery in common with others in a stream or river, the soil whereof belongs to a third person. 2 Comm. 34. It does not differ in any respect from other commonable rights, and trespass will not lie for an injury to it. 2 Salk. 637. See tit. Common.

There may be a prescriptive right in a subject to a several fishery in an arm of the sea.

FISHMONGERS' COMPANY. Formerly the wealthiest and most powerful of the civic associations or companies of the city of London. Originally it consisted of two great bodies: the salt-fishmongers, who were incorporated by letters patent in 1433, during the reign of Henry VI.; and the stock-fishmongers, incorporated by charter from Henry VII. in 1509. These two companies were incorporated into one by Henry VIII. in 1536, under the title of "The Wardens and Commonalty of the Mystery of Fishmongers;" and thus united, they form the fourth city company, before the goldsmiths'.

Chattels or articles of a FIXTURES. personal nature which have been affixed to land.

It is a maxim of great antiquity, that whatever is fixed to the realty is thereby made a part of the realty to which it adheres, and partakes of all its incidents and properties. the mere act of annexation a personal chattel becomes a parcel of the freehold itself, quicquid plantatur solo solo cedit. This general principle is recognized in almost all of the cases on the subject, and particularly in the following authorities. 10 H. 7. pl. 2: 20 H. 7. 13: 20 H. 7. 26: Co. Lit. 53. a. 4: Co. 63: B. The rule has, however, been greatly relaxed in modern times, and many exceptions to it

For instance, vessels and utensils of trade, such as furnaces, coppers, brewing vessels, fixed vats, salt-pans and the like. 1 Salk. 368: 3 Atk. 13: Amb. 113: 1 H. B. 259: 3 East, 56: B. N. P. 34.

Buildings for trade, as a varnish house; at least if built on plates laid on brickwork (2 East, 88); and so, it would seem, sheds called Dutch barns, formed of uprights rising from a foundation of brickwork. 3 Esp. 11. But see 3 East, 47. 55, 56.

It has not been distinctly established that a tenant may remove substantial and permanent As to taking or destroying fish in fishponds, additions to the premises, although built exclusively for the convenience of his trade; such as lime-kilns, pottery or brick-kilns (see 4 T. R. 504: 2 B. & C. 608); windmills (see 4 Leon. 241: 6 T. R. 377: 1 B. & B. 506) or watermills, or workshops, storehouses, and The buildings of that description. Neither is it satisfactorily laid down, that erections of a less substantial nature than these are in all cases removable by a tenant; as for example, the furnaces and flues of a smelting-house, glasshouse, &c., or the stones and floors of a malting-house. Cases of this kind are subject to considerable doubt, particularly where the removal of the article would greatly deteriorate the freehold to which it is attached, or where the structure and substance of the thing itself must be destroyed before it can be taken

2. Besides trade fixtures, a tenant may remove certain articles which he has put up for the ornament and furniture of his house, and for his domestic use and convenience.

following examples:-

Hangings, tapestry, and pier glasses nailed to the walls or pannels of a house; and even, Questions respecting the right to fixtures it is said, where they are put up in lieu of wainscot, marble, or other ornamental, as chimney-pieces; marble slabs, window blinds, 2 Saund. 259. n. 11: 3 East, 53: 7 Taunt.

But articles of this description can only be premises as not to have become a part of the though meant for ornament merely, if it be so removal would materially injure the structure. The following general rules seem to be the So neither will he be allowed to take away nent additions or improvements to the estate.

pull down a conservatory built on a brick foundation, and which is intimately connected with the dwelling house (2 B. & B. 54: 4 B. Moore, 440); or a pinery erected on brickwork, although built in a garden, and detached from the house itself. Id. Ibid.

But a tenant may so construct an erection or building that it shall not be considered to be affixed to the freehold in contemplation of the law; and then, whatever its purposes may be, and however substantial it is in itself, the landlord will have no right to it at the end of the term. For unless a thing is absolutely attached to the realty by being let into the ground, or united to the freehold by means of nails, screws, bolts, mortars, or the like, the law regards it as a mere loose and moveable

Thus if a tenant erects a barn, granary, stable, or any other building, upon blocks, rollers, stilts, or pillars, the landlord is not entitled to consider it as a part of his freehold. 11 Vin. Ab. 154: B. N. P. 34: 3 East, 55: 3 Esp. 1: 11 Taunt. 20.

So a varnish-house laid upon a wooden plate, resting on brickwork, the quarters being morticed into the plate, is a chattel and removable by the tenant. 4 Esp. N. P. C. 33: 2 East, 88. So a post windmill, at least if laid on cross traces not attached to the ground: 6 T. R. 377; and see 4 Leon. 241: 1 B. & B. 506. So vessels or utensils supported on brickwork frames, or horses standing on the ground. 9 East, 215. And the like of machinery let into caps or steps of timber, and even as it seems, although fastened by pins. 2 B. & A. 165.

By adopting, therefore, these or similar modes of construction a tenant may not only make valuable additions to his premises with perfect safety, but avoid the effect of a covenant in his lease to repair buildings erected after the commencement of the term. See 1

Taunt. 19: 2 B. & A. 165.

the cases furnish the subjoined list.

Grates, ranges, and stoves, fastened in brickwork; iron backs to chimneys; beds fastened to the ceiling; fixed tables; furnaces; coppers; mash-tubs and water-tubs fixed: coffeemills, malt-mills, jacks; cupboards fastened with holdfasts; clock-cases; iron ovens; and books, 8 H. 7. 12: 20 H. 7. 13: 21 H. 7. 26: Cro. But with regard to these fixtures, it is also

Thus it has been held, he is not entitled to privilege as a tenant in trace: were necessary to take away things; which he has anixed to the premises for purposes merely agricultural.

Thus a tenant may not remove a beast-house, a carpenter's shop, fuel-house, carthouse, pump-house, a fold-yard wall erected for the use of his farm, even though he left the premises in the same state as he found them on his entry. 3 East, 38.

This rule, however, is confined to articles of a strictly agricultural nature. For if the object of an erection has relation to a trade of any description, the tenant may take it away, notwithstanding it is the means or instrument of obtaining the profits of the land.

As for example, a mill for making cider; machinery for working mines and collieries; and, it would seem, utensils set up for manufacturing salt from springs upon the demised premises. 3 Atk. 12: Amb. 113: B. N. P.

34: 1 H. B. 259. n.

Fixtures of this kind belong to a class of cases which have been denominated mixed cases; and the questions to which they give rise with respect to the right of removing them are sometimes attended with much difficulty. See Amos on Fixtures, ch. 2. part. 1.

4. A nurseryman or gardener is entitled to remove and dispose of trees, shrubs, &c., which he has planted for the purpose of sale. 2 East, 89.7: Taunt 191: 4 Taunt. 316.

It has been held, however, that he cannot plough up strawberry beds in full bearing, at the close of his term, without having any reasonable object in view. 1 Camp. 227.

But a private person is not at liberty to sell and remove young fruit trees planted by himself (4 Taunt. 316); or a border of box (4 B. & C. 655); or even flowers (per Littledale, J.

The better opinion seems to be, that a gardener or nurserymam cannot take down hothouses, greenhouses, forcing pits, &c. which he has built during his tenancy. 2 East, 90: 3 East, 45.56: 2 B. & B. 58.

5. A tenant must remove his fixtures before the expiration of his tenancy, for he is not at liberty to insist on his claim afterwards (1 Salk. 368: 1 Atk. 477: Aub. 113: 7 Taunt 191: Com. Dig. Waste, D. 2.); neither can he, where he has neglected to take away during this term, maintain trover for them against the landlord. 1 B. & Ad. 394.

But if a tenant continues in possession of the premises after the end of his term (although against the will of his landlord), it seems he is entitled, during his continuing occupation, to remove the fixtures which he had previously neglected to take away. But even

It has been held that a custom for a lessee 3. A tenant in husbandry has not the same for years to remove his utensils within a cer-

The several foregoing rules are alike applicable, whether the tenant holds by lease under seal, or by a parol demise. And with respect to the description of fixtures which a tenant is authorized to remove, there is no distinction whether the party is lessee for life, for years, or merely tenant from year to year, &c.

But in applying these rules to practice, it should be observed that the rights both of landlord and tenant, in respect of fixtures, are frequently varied and controlled by the express terms of the demise, or the circumstances un- owner in fee. And therefore was allowed as between the executor and heir before a tenant severs an article from the freehold, it is necessary that he should examine his claim, not only with reference to the general law of fixtures, but also as it may be affected by any covenant or stipulation, expressed or implied, in his lease.

II. The executors of tenant for life, or tenant in tail, and the remainder man or reversioner. -- The point to be decided between these two classes, is, whether chattels annexed to the freehold by a tenant for life, or tenant in tail, become part of the inheritance, and pass with it to him in remainder, or in reversion; or they are to be considered as part of the personal estate of the deceased tenant for life, or tenant erected for a purpose in which trade and the in tail, and go to his executors.

The only two cases that have been decided between the last mentioned classes are Lawton v. Lawton, 3 Atk. 13; and Dudley v. Ward, Amb. 113; which establish that the descend to the heir as a parcel of the inheri-executors of tenants for life or tenants in tail tance. Thus salt-pans used in salt-works, executors of tenants for life or tenants in tail are entitled to fixtures erected for the purpose erected by deceased owner in his life time, on of trade, even where trade and the profits of land are combined.

In the former case it was held that a steam engine erected by a tenant for life; and in the latter, that fire-engines put up by a tenant for life, or tenant in tail; were to be considered as part of their personal estate, and were venience, the authorities are so contradictory. removable by their executors.

There is no doubt that the personal representatives of tenants for life or in tail, would be allowed at least the same privilege, in re- fixed to the freehold, and purchased with the moving fixtures against the remainder man or house, and hangings nailed to the wall (2 reversioner, that the personal representatives Freem. 249); hangings and looking glasses tenant for life, or in tail, has been called an " intermediate" one, between that of heir and accordingly it seems to be generally understood, that any determination in favour of an executor against an heir will support a similar claim between whatever parties it may arise.

With respect to the right of the executors of tenant for life or in tail, to fixtures put up for ornament or convenience, in the absence of direct authority, all cases which cannot be brought without the class of trade fixtures must be left to be inferred from determinations between the heir and the executor of the

III. The personal representative, and the flexible rule, that whatever was affixed to the freehold should descend to the heir as parcel was a decision of C. B. Comyns respecting a cider-mill, which was mentioned and approved of by Lord Hardwicke in 3 Atk. 14. This is the only case to be found in which it has been expressly held, that the exception on the ground of trade operates in favour of the personal estate against the claim of the heir. It appears, however, to establish a general principle that erections for the purpose of trade may be removed by the executor as part of the personal estate.

It is also to be inferred from the decision of the cider-mill, and the instance put by Lord Hardwicke, of the fire engine in a colliery, that the executor is entitled to remove articles profits of land are combined. But if the property in dispute be absolutely essential to the value and enjoyment of the real estate, it cannot be taken away by the executor, but will his estate which contained a salt spring, were held to go to the heir, as being accessories to the enjoyment and use of the inheritance. Lawton v. Salmon, 1 H. B. 260. in notis.

With regard to the right of the executor to remove fixtures erected for ornament and conthat the extent of the executor's claim is still involved in uncertainty.

In the older cases it was held that a furnace fixed to the walls with nails and serews (1 P. | and his laws, particularly against the courts W. 94); hangings, tapestry, and iron backs of justice; or for debt, when persons are unto chimneys (2 Str. 1141.); should belong to able or uniform to satisfy their creditors; the executor, and not to the heir. But in a there are large rules, and a warden or keeper later case it was said by the Court of K. B. that pots, ovens, and ranges, fixed by the owner Gaul. of a house, would go to the heir, and not to the executor. 5 B. & A. 625. And where the executor. 5 B. & A. 625. And so, on a more recent occasion, it was said by Bayley, J. that stoves, grates, and cupboards, were parcels of the freehold; and though they might be removed by a tenant and the amerciaments. Flit in English is during the term, yet they would go to the heir treason. Terms de la Ley. But see Fledand not to the executor. 4 B. & C. 686: and wite. see 2 N. & M. 428.

According, therefore, to these authorities, the courts seem to consider that the old rule of law has received only a very partial relaxation in the case of heir and executor.

Having said thus much generally, we may proceed more particularly to inquire,

I. What shall be deemed a Forcible entry, and what a Forcible Detainer. II. The Remedy for parties aggrieved.

I. What shall be deemed a Forcible Entry.-By stat. 5 Ric. 2. st. 1. c. 8. "None shall make any entry into any lands or tenements (or forcible entry shall be adjudged to enter with benefice of holy church, stat. 15 Ric. 2. c. 2. or him, whether they actually come upon the other possessions, stat. 1 H. 6. c. 9. § 2.), but where entry is given by the law; and in such case not with strong hand or with multitude of people, but only in peaceable and easy though unlawfully, afterwards retains possesmanner; on pain of imprisonment and ransom at the king's will."

A forcible entry is only such an entry as is made with a strong hand with unusual weapons, an unusual number of servants or attendants, or with menace of life or limb; for an entry which only amounts in law to a trespass, is not within the statutes. But an entry may be forcible, not only in respect of a violence actually done to the person of a man, but also in respect of any other kind of violence in the manner of the entry, as by breaking open the doors of a house, whether any person be in it there with force, this makes a forcible deat the time or not; especially if it be a dwelling tainer. If I hear that persons will come to house. So if a man enter to distrain for rent | my house to beat me, &c., and I take in force with force; for though he does not claim the to defend myself, it is no forcible detainer; land itself, he claims a right and title out of it though where they are coming to take lawful And though a man enter peaceably, yet if he possession only, it is otherwise. 2 Shep. 203. turn the party out of possession by force, or I If a man have two houses next adjoining, frighten him out of possession by personal the one by a defeasible title, and the other by threats or violence, this also amounts to a for- a good title; and he uses force in that he hath cible entry; but not if he merely threaten to by the good title to keep persons out of the spoil the party's goods, or destroy his cattle, or tother house, this is a forcible detainer. 2 Shep. do any injury which is not of a personal na- | Ab. 203. 1 Hawk. c. 64. § 25. et seq.: 3 Bac. A man enters into the house of another by the windows, and then threateneth the party, and he for fear doth leave the house, it is a forcible entry: so if one enter a house when no person is therein, with armed men, &c.

Moor. Cas. 185.

This offence may be committed of a rent, as well as of a house or land: as where one comes to distrain, and the tenant threatens to kill him, or forcibly makes resistance, &c. 2 Shep. 201. But forcible entry cannot be of a way or other easement: or of a common or office. 1 Hawk. P. C. So no man can be guilty of forcible entry, for entering with violence into lands or houses in his own sole possession at the time of entry; as by breaking open doors, &c. of his house detained from him by one who has the bare custody of it; but foint-tenants, or tenants in common, may be guilty of forcible entry, and holding out their companions.

A forcible entry may be committed by a single person as well as by twenty, and all who accompany a man when he makes a lands or not. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 64.

What a Forcible Detainer .- A forcible detainer is where a man who enters peaceably, sion by force, and the same circumstances of violence or terror which will make an entry forcible will make a detainer forcible also. And a detainer may be forcible whether the entry were forcible or not. 1 Hawk. P. C. c.64

If a person after peaceable entry shall make use of arms to defend his possession, &c. it will be forcible detainer: a man puts another out of his house by force, if he then puts in one of his servants in a peaceable manner, who keeps out the party, &c. it will be a forcible entry, but not a detainer; butif himself remaineth a house, and they refuse to let him in; this of itself will make a forcible detainer in all cases; but it must be upon complaint made. Dalt.

The Court of K. B. will not on motion hold plea of a forcible entry of the K. B. prison, and turning out the gaoler. Ld. Raym. 1005.

But a person is not guilty of a forcible detainer, by merely refusing to go out of a house, and continuing therein in despite of another. 1 Lil. Ab. 514: 1 Hawk. c. 64. s. 30. Neither is a man who keeps out of his lands by force, one claiming common upon it. Com. Dig. Forc. Det. (B. 2.)

II. The Remedy for Parttes aggrieved .-The remedy may be by action; or by justices of peace upon view; or by indictment or inquisition.

By stat. 8 H. 6. c. 9. § 6. "If any person be put out or disseissed of any lands or tenements in forcible manner, or put out forcibly and after holden out with strong hand; the party grieved shall have assize of novel dis- been in possession peaceably three years beseisin, or writ of trespass against the disseisor; and if he recover (or if any alienation be made to defraud the possessor of his right, which is also declared by the statute to be void), he shall have treble damages, and the defendant shall also make fine and ransom to the king,"

This act applies only to persons who have the freehold. Cole v. Eagle, 8 B. &. C. 409.

In an action on this statute if the defendant make title which is found for him, he shall be dismissed without any inquiry concerning the force; however punishable he may be for that

Which being found there, he shall be restored to his possession by a writ of restitution granted out of the same court to the sheriff. Dalt. c. 129.

Indictment of forcible entry lies not only for lands, but for tithes; also for rents; but not against a lord entering a common with force, for which the commoner may not indict him, because it is his own land. Cro. Car. 201. 486.

Indictments for forcible entry must set forth that the entry was manu forti, to distinguish this offence from other trespusses vi et armis; and there are many niceties to be observed in drawing the indictment, otherwise it will be quashed. Cro. Jac. 461: Dalt. 298. There must be certainty in this indictment; and no repugnancy, which is an incurable fault. An indictment of forcible entry was quashed, for that it did not set forth the estate of the party; so where the defendant hath not fore the indictment, without saying before the indictment found, &c. FOREST.

Foresta; Saltus.] A great or vast wood; locus sylvestris et saltuosus. Our law writers define it thus: Foresta est locus ubi feræ inha. bitant vel includuntur; others say it is called Foresta quasi ferarum statio, vel tuta mansio ferarum. Manwood, in his Forest Laws, gives this particular definition of it: " A forest is a certain territory or circuit of woody grounds and pastures, known in its bounds and privilege, for the peaceable being and abiding of wild beasts, and fowls of forest chase and warren, to be under the king's protection for his princely delight: replenished with beasts of venary or chase, and great coverts of vert for succour of the said beasts; for preservation whereof there are particular laws, privileges, and officers, belonging thereunto." Manw.

Forests are of that antiquity in England, that (except the New Forest in Hampshire, erected by William called the Conqueror, and see stat. 31 H. 8. c. 5.) it is said there is no record or history doth make any certain mention of their erections and beginnings; though divers of our laws and statutes. 4 Inst 319. Our ancient historians tells us, that New Forest was raised by the destruction of twenty two parish churches, and many villages, chapels, and manors, for the space of thirty miles together; which was attended with divers judgments, as they are termed, on the posterity of King William I., who erected it; for William Rufus was there shot with an arrow, and before him Richard the brother of Hen. I. was there killed; and Henry, nephew to Robert, the eldest son of the Conqueror, did hang, by the hair of his head, in the boughs of the forest like unto Absalom. Blount.

Besides the New Forest, there are sixtyeight other forests in England, thirteen chases, and mose than seven hundred parks: the four principal forests are New Forest on the Sea, Shirewood Forest on the Trent, Dean Forest on the Severn, reafforested by stat. 20 Car. 2. c. 3., and Windsor Forest on the Thames. The way of making a forest is thus: Certain commissioners are appointed under the great seal of England, who view the ground intended for a forest, and fence it returned into the Chancery, the king causes and court of attachment. The third property it to be proclaimed throughout the county is the officers belonging to it; as first, the where the land lieth, that it is a forest, and to justices of the forest, the warden or warder, be governed by the laws of the forest, and the verderors, foresters, agisters, regarders, prohibits all persons from hunting there with- keepers, baliffs, beadles &c. See tit. Attachout his leave; and then he appointeth officers fit for the preservation of the vert and venison, and so it becomes a forest on record. Manw. c. 2. Though the king may erect a forest on his own ground and wastes, he may not do it in the ground of other persons, without their consent; and agreements with them for that purpose ought to be confirmed by parliament. 4 Inst. 300.

Proof of a forest appears by matter of record; as by the eyres of the justices of the forests, and other courts, and officers of forests, &c., and not by the name in grants. 12 Rep. 22. As parks are enclosed with wall, pale, &c., so forests and chases are enclosed by metes and bounds; such as rivers, highways, hills, which are an enclosure in law, and without which there cannot be a forest. And in the eye of the law, the boundaries of a forest go round about it as it were a brick wall, directly in a right line the one from the other, and they are known either by matter of record or prescription. 4 Inst. 317. Bounds of a forest may be ascertained by commission from the Lord Chancellor; and commissioners, sheriffs, officers of forests, &c., are empowered to make inquests thereof. Stat. 16 and 17 Car. 1. c. 16. Also the boundaries of forests are reckoned a part of the forest; for if any person kill or hunt any of the king's deer in any highway, river or other inclusive boundary of a forest, he is as great an offender as if he had killed or hunted deer within the forest itself. 4 Inst. 318.

By the grant of a forest, the game of the forest do pass; and beasts of the forest are the hart, hind, buck, doe, boar, wolf, fox, hare, &c.: the seasons for hunting whereof are as follow, viz. that of the hart and buck begins at the Feast of St. John Baptist, and ends at Holyrood-day; of the hind and doe, begins at Holyrood, and continues till Candlemas; of the boar, from Christmas to Candlemas; of the fox, begins at Christmas, and continues till Lady-day; of the hare, at Michaelmas, and lasts till Candlemas. Dyer, 169: 4 Inst.

As to the Courts. The most especial court of a forest is the swainmote, which is no less incident to it than a court of piepowder to a fair; and if this fail, there is nothing remaining of the forest, but it is turned into the nature of a chase. Manw. c. 21: Crompt. Jur. 146.

The court of attachment or woodmote in forests is kept every forty days; at which the foresters bring in the attachments de viridi et venatione, and the presentments thereof, and the verderors do receive the same, and inrol them; but this court can only inquire, not convict. The court of swainmote is holden before the verderors as judges, by the steward of the swainmote, thrice in the year; the swains or freeholders within the forest are to appear at this court to make inquests and juries; and this court may inquire de superoneratione forestariorum et aliorum ministrorum forestæ, et de eorum oppressionibus populo nostro illatis: and also may receive and try presentments certified from the court of attachments, against offences in vert or venison. And this court may inquire of offences, and convict also, but not give judgment, which must be at the justice seat. 4 Inst. 289.

The Court of Regard, or survey of dogs, is holden likewise every third year, for expeditation, or lawing of dogs, by cutting off to the skin three claws of the fore feet, to prevent their running at or killing of deer. No other dogs but mastiffs are to be thus lawed or expeditated, for none other were permitted to be kept within the precincts of the forest, it being supposed that the keeping of these, and these only, was necessary for the defence of a man's house. 4 Inst. 308.

The principal court of the forest is the Court of the Chief Justice in Eyre, or justice seat, which is a court of record, and hath authority to hear and determine all trespasses, pleas, and causes of the forest, &c. within the forest, as well concerning vert and venison, as other causes whatsoever; and this court cannot be kept oftener than every third year. As before other justices in eyre, it must be summoned forty days at least before the sitting thereof; and one writ of summons is to be directed to the sheriff of the county, and anmons consists of two parts; first, to summon all the officers of the forest, and that they bring with them all records, &c. Secondly, All persons who claim any liberties or franchises within the forest, and to show how they claim the same. These justices in eyre were instituted by Henry II. A. D. 1184: and their courts were formerly held very regularly; but the last court of justice seat of any note was that holden in the reign of Charles I. before the Earl of Holland; the rigorous proceedings at which are reported by Sir W. Jones. After the restoration another was held, pro forma only, before for life, is made justice of the same forest pro the Earl of Oxford; but since the æra of the hac vice, the forestership is become void; for revolution in 1688, the forest laws have fallen these offices are incompatible, as the forester is into total disuse, to the great advantage of under the correction of the justice, and he the subject. .The cruel and insupportable hardships which the forest laws created to the subject, occasioned our ancestors to be as zealous for reformation, as for the relaxation of the fædal rigours and the other exactions introduced by the Norman family. And accordingly we find, in history, the immunities of Charta de Foresta as warmly contended for, and extorted from the king with as much difficulty, as those of Magna Charta itself. By this charter confirmed in parliament many forests were disafforested st. 2. c. 46: 53 G. 3. c. 143: 47 G. 3. or stripped of their oppressive privileges; and 56 G. 3.c. 132. regulations made in the regimen of such as remained. Drift of the Forest, Timber, &c.

In the year 1787-1793, a series of reports. (17 in number,) was made by commissioners specially appointed to inquire into the state of the woods, forests, and land revenues of the crown. The third report gives a list of the forests, parks, and chases in England, then under the survey of the surveyor general of timber; these are in Berkshire, Windsor Fo. rest, Cranburn Chase, and Windsor Great and Little Park. Essex, Waltham Forest, anciently called the Forest of Essex, and sometimes Epping or Hainault Forest. Glouces. tershire, Dean Forest. Hampshire, the New Forest, Alice Holt, and Woolmer Forest, Bere Forest. Kent, Greenwich Park. Mid. dlesex, St. James's Park, Hyde Park, Bushy Park, and Hampton Court Park. Northamp. tonshire, the Forests of Whittlewood, Salcey, and Rockingham. Nottinghamshire, Sherwood Forest. Oxfordshire, Whichwood Forest. Surrey, Richmond Park. Of these, Sherwood is the only one North of Trent; the others all being South of Trent.

By several acts, passed in consequence of these reports and further inquiries, the boundaries of several of these and other forests have been ascertained, and regulations made for disafforesting and inclosing them in part or in the whole; and applying them to the bene-

FORESTALLING. Forestallamentum, from the Saxon fore, before, and stal, a stall.] To intercept on the highway. Spelman says it is viæ obstructio, vel itineris interceptio; with whom agrees Coke on Lit. fol. 161. And, according to Fleta, forestalling significat obstructionem viæ vel impedimentum transitus et fugæ avariorum, &c. lib. 1. c. 24. In our law, forestalling is the buying or bargaining for any corn, cattle or orther merchandise, by the way, as they come to fairs or markets to be sold, before they are brought thither; to the intent to sell the same again, at a higher and dearer price.

All endeavours to enhance the common price of any victuals or merchandise, and practices which have an apparent tendency thereto, whether by spreading false rumours, or buying things in a market before the accustomed hour, or by buying and selling again the same thing in the same market, &c. are highly criminal by the common law; and all such offences anciently came under the offence against public trade. This was desgeneral appellation of forestalling. 3 Inst. 195, 196. And so jealous is the common law of practices of this nature, which are a general merchandise, or victual coming in the way to inconvenience and prejudice to the people, and very oppressive to the poorer sort, that it ing their goods or provisions there; or persuadwill not suffer corn to be sold in the sheaf before thrashed: for by such sale the market is any of which practices makes the market dearin effect forestalled. 3 Inst. 197: H. In which case it was ruled that to forestall any commodity which is become a common victual and necessary of life, or used as an ingredient in the making or preservation of any victual, though not formerly used or considered as such, is an offence at common law.

I. As to alienations by particular tenants; if tenant for his own life aliens, by feoffment or fine for the life of another, or in tail, or in fee; these being estates, which either must or may last longer than his own, the creating them is not only beyond his power, and inconsistent with the nature of his interest, but is also a forfeiture of his own particular estate to him in remainder or reversion. Litt. § 415. For this there seem to be two reasons: first. because such alienation amounts to a renunciation of the fædal connection and dependence; it implies a refusal to perform the due renders and services to the lord of the fee, of which fealty is constantly one, and it tends in its consequence to defeat and divest the re-FORISFACTURA, from the Fr. But in case of such forfeitures, by particular tenants, all legal estates by them before created (as if tenant for 20 years grants a lease for 15), and all charges by them lawfully made on the lands, shall be good and available in the law. In petit treason, misprison of treason, and felony, the offender, until recently, forfeited the profits of all estates of freehold during ments in fee simple (but not those in tail), to the crown for a short period of time: for the king should have them for a year and a day, and might commit therein what waste he pleased, which was called the king's year, day, and waste, 2 Inst. 37. 3 Inst. 392. Formerly the king had a liberty of committing waste on the lands of felons, by pulling down their houses, extirpating their gardens, ploughing their meadows, and cutting down their woods. But this tending greatly to the prejudice of the public, it was agreed in the reign of Hen. I. that the king should have the profits of the land for a year and a day, in lieu of the destruction he was otherwise at liberty to commit; and therefore Magna Charta, c. 22. provided that the king should only hold such lands for a year and a day, and then restore them to the lord of the c. 4. § 16: Flet. l. 1. c. 28. But the stat. 17 E. 2. de prærogativa regis seemed to suppose that and not the year and day instead of waste: which Lord Coke and the Mirror very justly considered as an encroachment, though a very

At common law, forgery was only a misdemeanor, and in some of the early statutes it is Forfeiture differs from confiscation, in that treated rather as a civil injury than a criminal offence. When, however, the extension of trade and commerce gave birth to the system of paper credit, it was found necessary to repress forgery by innumerable acts, which, for the most part, rendered the crime a capital felony. The severity of the statute law was partially mitigated by the 11 G. 4. and 1. W. 4. c. 66. which repealed many of the former acts, and incorporated and consolidated all forgeries that were intended still to be punishable with death. By this act, those offences which were made capital felonies by previous statutes, but are not therein declared to be such, are punishable with transportation for life or seven years, or with imprisonment not exceeding four, and not less than two years. The feeling of the country calling strongly for a further relaxation of the rigor with which this offence was treated, induced the legislature shortly afterwards to pass the 2 and 3 W. 4. c. 123. which abolished the penalty of death, and substituted transportation agement, and married another. I. What amounts to a Forgery.—The making of any instrument which is the subject of forgery with a fraudulent intent, is of itself a sufficient completion of the offence without uttering or publishing, and consequently before any injury is sustained; for though publication be the medium by which the intent

And the fraudulent application of gery to make a false will of a living person, a true signature to a false instrument, for which it was not intended, or vice versa, will also be a forgery. Id. ibid.

To make a mark to a promissory note, or any other document, in the name of another person, with intent to defraud, is as much a forgery as if the party had signed that person's name. 1 Leach, 57: 2 East, P. C.

Forgery may be committed by a party making a false deed in his own name; as where a party made a feoffment of lands, and dated it prior to a former deed, whereby he conveyed the same lands; for he falsifies the date in order to defraud his own feoffee. 3 Inst. 169: 1 Hall, 683: Fost. 117: 1 Hawk. c. 70. § 2.

So a man is guilty of forgery who gets possession of a bill of exchange drawn in favour of another person of the same name, and, knowing he is not the real payer, indorses it for the purposes of fradulently appropriating the money. 4 T. R. 28.

Also where a note is made by a party in an assumed name and character with intent to defraud, the offence is forgery, though the note is made, and offered as that of the party himself, and not as the note of another person. 1 Leach, 57: 2 East, P. C. 962.

And the making of any false instrument with a fraudulent intent, although in the name of a fictitious person, is as much a forgery as if it had been made in the name of one who was known to exist, and to whom credit was due. 2 East, P. C. 957, 958: Post. 116: 1

In order to constitute the crime of forgery. it is immaterial whether, in discounting a bill in an assumed name, any additional credit is gained by the assumption, or whether the money might not have been as well obtained by indorsing the bill in the real name of the party uttering it. 1 Leach, 172: 2 East, P. before the time he had the fraud in view, even C. 359. And it is the same where a receipt in the absence of proof as to what name he is given in a false name as the party's own name, and the object is to escape detection, and the intent to defraud: 1 Leach, 214: 2 East, P. C. 960; nothwithstanding the credit has been given to the person, and not to the name. 1 Leach, 226. And the case will be equally forgery, though the bill or draft is taken by the prosecutor on the personal credit of the party, and on the presumption that the assumed name is his own, and though the prosecutor would have given him equal credit if he had passed by his real name. R. & R. 75. 90. 209.

Neither is it material that the forged instrument should be so made, that, if genuine, employed for a criminal purpose, the employer it would be valid; but it is essential to the is responsible for his acts. 2 Leach, 978: 1 crime of forgery, that the false instrument N. C. 953; would not subject the maker or utterer to the punishment of forgery; as these documents have no semblance of validity in law.

It seems that a man cannot be guilty of forgery by a bare nonfeasance; as if in drawing a will he should omit a legacy which he was directed to insert; but it appears to have been holden, that if the omission of a bequest to one cause a material alteration in the limitation of a bequest to another, as where the omission of a devise of an estate for life to one man causes a devise of the same lands to another, to pass a present estate, which would otherwise have passed a remainder only, the person making such an omission is guilty of forgery. Moor, 763: Noy. 101: 1 Hawk. P. C.

c. 70. § 6: 2 East, P. C.c. 70. § 2.

Where a person drew a bill inserting the real name of the acceptor, but giving a false description of him, it was held not to be a forgery. R. & R. 405: 3 B. & B. 228. And where a prisoner was convicted of forging an acceptance to a bill of exchange in the name of Scott, and it did not appear that he had not gone by that name before the time of accepting the bill in question, or that he assumed it for that particular purpose; a majority of the judges held the conviction wrong. R. & R. 260. But if there be satisfactory proof of the prisoner's real name, and that the false name has been assumed for concealment, with a view to a fraud of which the forgery is a part; it is for him to prove that he used the assumed name had used for several years before the fraud was perfected. R. & R. 278.

II. What is an Uttering .- Any disposal or negotiation of a forged instrument to another person with a fraudulent intent, provided the party disposing of it knows it to be forged, is an uttering, which by most of the statutes on the subject is made a substantive offence.

Where a person knowingly delivers a forged note to an innocent agent, for the purpose of its being uttered by him, and he utters it accordingly, this is an uttering by the first party; for wherever an innocent person is given to an accomplice. R. & M. 166. And | tent, whereby another may be prejudiced, is though it has been doubted whether in a case forgery at common law. 2 East's P. C. c. 19. like the last the party ought not to be indict. \ \ 7. ed as an accessory before the fact, and not as a principal; it appears to be the better opi-struments comprised in the statutes on the nion that he may be charged as the utterer. 1 N. R. 96. But to indict as a principal, there must be satisfactory proof, either of an actual delivery of the note by him to the accomplice, are declared capital felonies by acts passed or else that he was present when the latter uttered it; otherwise he can only be charged as an accessory before the fact. R. & R. 25; H. 363. See post, V.

The offence of uttering is complete, though the note was delivered by the prisoner to an agent employed to detect him; if the note be the 2 and 3 W. 4. c. 123, may at the discretion delivered to the agent for the purpose of being disposed of as a good one. 2 Leuch, 1019: 2 Taunt. 331: R. & R. 154. So delivering a box containing forged instruments to the party's own servant, that he may take them to an inn to be conveyed by a carrier to a customer in the country, is an uttering. 2 Leach. 1048: 4 Taunt. 300: R. & R. 212. So likewise the offence of uttering was held complete, where the prisoner delivered a forged bill to another person as a pledge to obtain credit. R. & R. 86.

III. Of the Intent to defraud .- By all the statutes a fraudulent intent is made an essential ingredient to the crime of forgery. But it is immaterial, whether any person be actually defrauded or not; it is sufficient if he may be thereby prejudiced. 2 East, P. C. 854. And the intent need not be to defraud any particular person, as a general intent to defraud is sufficient; for if a man wilfully do life, forfeiture of lands, &c. 2 and 3 Anne, an act, the probable consequence of which is c. 4. § 19: 5 and 6 Anne, c. 18. § 8: 7 Anne, to defraud, it will, in contemplation of law, c. 20. § 15: 8 G. 2. c. 6. § 21. By 11. G. 4. and 1 W. 4 c. 66. § 28. it is sufficient in an indictment to name one person only of any company or society of persons not incorporated, or any person or number of persons whatsoever, who may be intended to be defrauded by any offence within the act, and to allege the offence to have been committed with intent to defraud the person so named, and another or others, as the case may be.

Formerly great difficulty existed with respect to the venue or place where the offence was to be tried, as direct proof can seldom be given of the act of forgery; but this has been removed by the 11 G. 4. and 1 W. 4. c. 66. § 24. under which persons guilty of any species of forgery, whether at common law or otherwise, may be indicted, tried, and punished in any county or place where they have been apprehended, or are in custody.

Upon alienation by a tenant in tail, whereby the estate tail is discontinued, and the remainder or reversion is, by failure of the particular estate, displaced and turned to a mere right, the remedy is by this action of formedon (secundum formam doni), which is in the nature of a writ of right, and is the highest action that tenant in tail can have. Finch. L. 257: Co. Litt. 316. For tenant in tail cannot have an absolute writ of right, which is confined to such only as claim in fee-simple; and for that reason this writ of formedon was granted him by the statute de donis (Westm. 2. 13 Ed. 1. c. 1.), which is therefore emphatically called his writ of right. F. N. B. 255.

A writ of formedon in the descender lieth where a gift in tail is made, and the tenant in tail aliens the land intailed, or is disseised of them and dies: in this case the heir in tail shall have this writ of formedon in the descender, to recover these lands so given in tail, against him who is then the actual tenant of the freehold. In which case the demandant is bound to state the manner and form of the gift in tail, and to prove himself heir secundum formam doni. F. N. B. 211, 212.

A formedon in the remainder lieth where a man giveth lands to another for life or in tail, with remainder to a third person in tail or in fee; and he who hath the particular estate dieth without issue inheritable and a stranger intrudes upon him in remainder, and keeps him out of possession. In this case the remainder-man shall have this writ of formedon equity of the statute, and upon this maxim in law, that if any one hath a right to land, he ought also to have an action to recover it. See F. N. B. 217.

A formedon in the reverter lieth where there is a gift in tail, and afterwards by the death of the donee or his heirs without issue of his body, the reversion falls in upon the donor, his heirs or assigns; in such case the reversioner shall have this writ to recover the lands, wherein he shall suggest the gift, his own title to the reversion minutely derived from the donor, and the failure of issue upon which his reversion takes place. F. N. B. 219: 8 Rep. See 3 Comm. 192. n. This lay at common law, before the statute de donis, if the donee aliened before he had performed the condition of the gift by having issue and afterwards died without any. Finch. L. 268.

The time of limitation in a formedon, by stat. 21 Jac. 1. c. 16. is twenty years, within which space of time after his title accrues, the demandant must bring his action, or else is for ever barred. See 3 Comm. 191-193.

There is a writ of formedon in descender, where partition of lands held in tail is made among parceners, &c., and one alieneth her part; in this case her heir shall have this writ; and by the death of one sister without issue, the partition is made void, and the other shall have the whole land as heir in tail. Also there is a writ of formedon insimul tenuit, that lies for a coparcener against a stranger upon the possession of the ancestor; which may be brought without naming the other coparcener who hath her part in possession. This writ may be likewise had by one heir in gavelkind, &c. of lands intailed; and where the lands are held without partition. New Nat. Brev. 476, 477. 481.

Where a fee-simple is demanded in a formedon in reverter, the taking of the profits ought to be alleged in the donor and donee: if an estate tail is demanded, it must be alleged in the donee only. 1 Lutw. 96.

There are several pleas both in bar and in abatement, which the tenant may plead to this action; such as non-tenure, which is a plea in abatement, and by which the tenant shows that he is not tenant of the freehold, or of some part thereof, at the time of the writ brought, or at any time since, which is called the pleading non-tenure generally. Booth. 28.

Special non-tenure is where the tenant shows what interest and estate he hath in the land demanded, as that he is tenant for years, in ward, by statute merchant, elegit, or the like; and therefore the plea of special nontenure must always show who is tenant.

Booth, 29. See 1 Brownl. 153.

At common law, non-tenure of parcel of an in the remainder, wherein the whole form of entire thing, as a manor, &c. abated the whole writ; but now, by the stat. 25 Ed. 3. c. held and possessed beyond the year and day. 16. it is enacted, "That by the exception of Termes de la Ley. non-tenure of parcel, no writ shall be abated, but only for that parcel whereof the non-tenure | led in Westmoreland. Camd. Britan. was alleged. Booth, 29: 1 Mod. 181.

If the tenant pleads non-tenure of the whole, he need not show who is tenant; but in a plea of non-tenure of parcel he must show who is tenant, and this even before the statute: for the common law would not suffer a writ, good in part, to be wholly destroyed, except the tenant showed the demandant how he might Scotch law is an action in the nature of a fohave a better. 1 Mod. 181. FRAMPOLE FENCES. Such fences as the tenants in the manor of Writtle in Essex set up against the lord's demesnes; and they are entitled to the wood growing on those fences, and as many poles as they can reach from the top of the ditch with the helve of an axe, towards the reparation of their fences. It is thought the word frampole comes from the Saxon frempul, profitable; or that it is a corruption of francpole, because the poles are free to the tenants to take. But chief Justice Brampton, whilst he was steward of the court of the manor of Writtle, acknowledged that he could not find out the reason why those fences were called frampole; so that we are at a loss to know the truth of this name etymologically.

FRANCHISE, Fr.] A privilege or exemption from ordinary jurisdiction; as for a corporation to hold pleas to such a value, &c. And sometimes it is an immunity from tribute, when it is either personal or real, that is, belonging to a person immediately; or by means of this or that place whereof he is a chief or member. Cromp. Jurisd. 141

There is also a franchise royal; which seems to be that where the king's writ runs not. 21 H. 6. c. 4. But franchise royal is said by some authors to be where the king grants to one and his heirs, that they shall be quit of toll, &c. Bract. lib. 2. c. 5.

Franchises are a species of incorporeal hereditaments. Franchise and liberty are used as synonymous terms; and their definition is, "A royal privilege or branch of the king's prerogative, subsisting in the hands of a subject." Finch. L. 164. Being therefore derived from the crown, they must arise from the king's grant; or in some cases may be held by prescription, which pre-supposes a grant. Finch. L. 164. The kinds of them are various and almost infinite: they may be vested either in natural persons, or in bodies politic; in one man or many: but the same indentical franchise that has before been granted to one, cannot be bestowed on another, for that would prejudice the former grant. 2 Rol. Ab. 191: Keilw. 196.

The principality of Wales is a franchise. To be a county palatine is also a franchise, vested in a number of persons. It is likewise a franchise, for a number of persons to be incorporated, and subsist as a body politic; with a power to maintain perpetual succession, and do corporate acts; and each individual member of such corporation is also said to have a franchise or freedom. Other franchises are, to hold a court-leet; to have a manor or lordship; or at least to have a lordship paramount; to have waifs, wrecks, estrays, treasure-trove, royal-fish, forfeitures, and deodands; to have a court of one's own, or liberty of holding pleas, and trying causes; to have the conusance of pleas, which is a still greater liberty, being an exclusive right, so that no other court shall try causes arising within that jurisdiction (see this Dict. tit. Cognizance); to have a bailiwick, or liberty exempt from the sheriff of the county, wherein the grantee only and his officers are to execute all process; to have a fair or market, with the right of taking toll, either there or at any other public places, as at bridges, wharfs, or the like; which tolls must have a reasonable cause of commencement (as in consideration of repairs, or the like), else the franchise is illegal and void. 2 Inst. 220. (see this Dict. tits. Fair, Toll.) Or lastly, to have a forest, chase, park, warren, or fishery, endowed with privileges of royalty. F. N. B. 230. See this Dict. tit. Forest, &c.

Usage may uphold franchises, which may be claimed by prescription, without record either of creation, allowance, or confirmation; and wreck of the sea, waifs, strays, fairs, and markets, and the like, are gained by usage, and may become due without any matter of record. But goods of felons and outlaws, and such like, grow due by charter, and cannot be claimed by usage, &c. 2 Inst. 281; 9 Rep. 27: 2 Comm. 265.

It hath been adjudged that grants of franchises, made before the time of memory, ought to have allowance, within the time of memory, in the King's Bench; or before the barons of the Exchequer, or by some confirmation on record; and it is said they are not records pleadable, if they have not the aid of some matter of record within time of memory; and such ancient grants, after such allowance, shall be construed as the law was when they were made, and not as it hath been since altered; but franchises granted within time of memory are pleadable without any allowance or confirmation; and if they have been allowed or confirmed as aforesaid, the franchises may be claimed by force thereof, without showing the charter. 9 Rep. 27, 28: 2 Inst. 281, 494. sheriff, upon a non omittas, or on a capias ter. 9 Rep. 27, 28: 2 Inst. 281, 494.

There have been formerly several ancient prerogatives derived from the crown, besides the franchises aforementioned; as power to pardon felony, make justices of assize, and of the peace, &c. But by the stat. 27 H. 8. c. 24. they were resumed and re-united to the crown. The king cannot grant power to another to make strangers born denizens here, because such power is by law inseparably annexed to his person. 7 Rep. 25.

By Magna Charta, c. 1. and several ancient statutes, the church shall have all her liberties and franchises inviolable. And the lords spiritual and temporal shall enjoy their liberties, &c., and the king may not deprive them of any of them. 14 Ed. 3. st. 2. c. 1: 2 H. 4. c. 1.

By Magna Charta, c. 37., the franchises and liberties of the city of London, and all other cities, towns, &c., are confirmed. By stat. 27 H. 8. c. 24. all writs, processes, &c., in franchises, are to be made in the king's name; and stewards, bailiffs, and other ministers of liberties, shall attend the justices of assize, and make due execution of process, &c.

Some franchises, as York, Bristol, &c., have return of writs, to whom mandates are directed from the courts above, to execute writs and process; and a mayor or bailiff of a town may have liberty to keep courts, and hold pleas in a certain place, according to the course of the common law; and power to draw causes out of the king's courts, by an exclusive jurisdiction: but the causes here may be removed to the superior courts. Co. Lit. 114: 4 Inst. 87. 224.

Sheriffs of counties, within which is any franchise, the lord whereof is entitled to a return of writs, shall, on his request, appoint one or more deputies to reside at some place near there, to receive all writs in the sheriff's name, and under his seal to issue warrants for their due execution; and the Lord Chancellor is to settle the charges to be paid any such deputy, &c. Stat. 13 G. 2. c. 18.

A franchise hath no relation to the county wherein it lies, as has been generally held; for it is not necessary to set forth the county when any thing is shown to be done within a liberty or franchise. Trin. 23 Car. B. R

If a franchise fails to administer justice within the same, the franchise shall not be allowed; but on any such failure, the Court of B. R. may compel the owners of the franchise, &c., to do justice; for that court ought to see justice equally distributed to all persons. 1 Lill. Abr. 635.

Wherever the king is party to a suit, as in all informations and indictments, the process ought to be executed by the sheriff, and not by the bailiff of any franchise, whether it have the clause non omittas, &c., or not; for the king's prerogative shall be preferred to any franchise. 2 Hawk. P. C. A sheriff, upon a non omittas, or on a capias utlagatum, or quo minus, may enter and make arrests in a franchise. I Lill. 635. An arrest by the sheriff within a franchise on a common writ, is said to be good, though the officer be subject to an action at the suit of the lord of the franchise, &c. See tit. Arrest.

By the long established usage of the King's Bench, a capias with a non omittas clause may issue in the first instance, and be executed by the sheriff in a particular liberty (such as the Honour of Pontefract in the county of York, the bailiff of which has the execution and return of writs), without a prior latitat first issued, and a return of mandari ballivo qui nullum dedit responsum.

Carrel v. Smallpage, 9 East, 330.

Where, by letters patent, James I. granted to A. and his heirs that he and they, by his or their bailiff or bailiffs for that purpose from time to time deputed, should have full return of all writs, mandates, and precepts, within a certain district; and that no sheriff, or other officer, should intermeddle concerning such returns, or enter to do any thing in execution of the premises, unless through the default of the bailiff or bailiffs of A. or his heirs. Held that, by virtue of this special grant, the bailiffs odeputed might return writs, &co., iu his own name. 3 B. & Ad. 630.

Franchises may be forfeited and seized where they are abused, for mis-user or nonuser, and when there are many points, a mis-user of any one will make a forfeiture of the whole on a quo warranto brought. Kitch. 65. For contempt of the king's writ, in a county palatine, &c., the liberties may be seized, and the offenders fined; and the temporalities of a bishop have been adjudged to be seized until he satisfied the king for such a contempt, on information exhibited, &c. Cro. Car. 253. The Bishop of Durham pretending he had such a franchise, that the king's writ was not to come there, and because one brought it thither he imprisoned him; this being proved upon an information brought against him, it was adjudged he should pay a fine to the king, and lose his liberties. 2 Shep. Abr. 250.

If a person claims franchises which he ought not to have, it is an usurpation upon the king; and not showing his title the king shall take from him his franchise. Poph. 180: 1 Bulst. 54. The King's Bench will not grant an information on private usurpation of franchises, but the proper remedy is to proceed by quo warranto. Hardw. 261.

If franchises and liberties are granted to the king, which were before in esse, as flowers of his crown, and afterwards by escheaf, surrender, or otherwise, come back to the crown, they are re-united to the crown, and the king has them in jure corona as before. 9 Co. 256. But if franchises, liberties, &c., created de novo by the king, come back to the crown, they are not merged or extinguished in the crown. 9 Co. 25. b.: 1 And. 87. See Cro. Eliz. 592: Dyer, 327. a.: Com. Dig. tit. Franchise (G).

Disturbance of franchises happens when a man has the franchise of holding a courtleet, of keeping a fair or market, of free warren, of taking toll, of seizing waifs or estrays, or, in short, any other species of franchise whatsoever, and he is disturbed or incommoded in the lawful exercise thereof. As if another by distress, menaces, or persussions, prevail upon the suitors not to appear at my court; or obstruct the passage to my fair or market; or hunts in my free warren; or refuses to pay me the accustomed toll; or hinders me from seizing the waif or estray, whereby it escapes, or is carried out of my liberty: in all cases of this kind, and which are of a variety too extensive to be here enumerated, an injury is done to the legal owner of the franchise; his property is damnified: and the profits arising from such his franchise are diminished. medy which, as the law has given no other writ, he is therefore entitled to sue for damages by a special action on the case: or in case of toll, may make a distress, if he pleases. 3 Comm. 236.

either of the nullum tempus acts of the 21 J. 1. c 2. and the 9 G. 3. c. 16.

FRANKALMOIGN, Libera Eleemosyna, Free Alms.] A tenure by spiritual service, where an ecclesiastical corporation, sole or aggregate, holdeth land to them and their successors, of some lord and his heirs in free and perpetual alms. And perpetual supposes it to be a fee simple: though it may pass without the word successors. Lit. § 133: Co. Lit. 94. A lay person cannot hold in free alms; and when a grant is in frankalmoign, no mention is to be made of any manner of service. Lit. 137. None can hold in frankalmoign but by prescription, or by force of some grant made before the statute of Mortmain (7 Ed. 1. st. 2.) and the 18 Ed. 1. st. 1. c. 3. So that the tenure cannot at this day be created, to hold of a founder and his heirs in free alms; but the king is not restrained by the statutes; nor a subject licensed or dispensed with by the king, to make such a grant, &c. Co. Lit. 98, 99. And if an ecclesiastical person holds lands by fealty and certain rent, the hold to him and his successors in frankalmoign; for the former services are extinct. and nothing is reserved but that he should hold of him, which he did before; whereby this change and alteration is not within the stat. 18 Ed. 1. of quia emptores terrarum. Lit. 140 540: Co. Lit. 99. 306.

Tenure in frankalmoign is incident to the inheritable blood of the donor or founder; except in case of the king, who may grant this tenure to hold of him and his successors. Lit. 135. And the reason why a grant in frankalmoign, since the stat. 18 Ed. 1. (quia emptores) is void, except in the case of the king, &c., is because none can hold land by this tenure, but of the donor; whereas the statute enjoins, that it be held of the chief lord, by the same service by which the feoffor held it; though the king may grant away any estate, and reserve the tenure to himself. Co. Lit. 99, 223.

The service which ecclesiastical corporations were bound to render for lands held in frankalmoign was not certainly defined, but only in general, to pray for the souls of the donor and his heirs, dead or alive; and therefore they did no fealty (which is incident to all other services but this), because this divine service was of a higher and more exalted nature. Lit. § 134, 135.

This is the tenure by which almost all the ancient monasteries and religious houses held their lands; and by which the parochial clergy and very many ecclesiastical and eleemosynary foundations hold them to this day, the nature of the service being, upon the Reformation, altered and made conformable to the doctrines of the Church of England. It was an old Saxon tenure, and continued under the Norman revolution; from the respect then shown to religion and religious men: which is also the reason that tenants in frankalmoign were discharged of all other services, except the trinoda necessitas of repairing the highways, building castles, and repelling invasions. See Bract. l. 4. tr. 1. c. 28. § 1: Seld. Jan. 1. 42.

Even at present, this is a tenure of a nature very distinct from all others, being not in the least feodal, but merely spiritual. For this reason, if any person that holds lands or tenements in frankalmoign, make any failure in doing such Divine service as they ought, the Lord may make complaint of it to the ordinary or visitor; which is the king, if he be founder, or a subject where he was appointed visitor upon the foundation; and the ordinary, &c. may punish the negligence, according to the ecclesiastical Lit. 136: Co. Lit. 96. laws.

In this particular, tenure in frankalmoign materially differs from what was called tenure by Divine service: in which tenants were obliged to do some special Divine services in certain: as to sing so many masses, to distribute such a sum in alms, and the like; which, being expressly defined and prescribed, could with no kind of propriety be called free alms; especially as for this, if the gift, i. e. sciant, &c. me A. B. dedisse et unperformed, the lord might distrain without any complaint to the visitor. Lit. § 137: uxori cjus, filie, &c. in liberum maritagium, Brit. c. 66.

These donations in frankalmoign are now out of use, as none but the king can make them; but they are expressly excepted, by name, in the stat. 12 Car. 2. c. 24. (§ 7.) abolishing tenures, and therefore subsist in many instances at the present day. 2 Comm. 101. c. 6.

FRANK-FEE. Freehold lands which are held exempted from all services, but not from homage. In the register of writs we find that is frank-free which a man holds at the common law, to him and his heirs; and not by such service as is required in ancient demesne, according to the custom of the manor; and that the lands in the hand of King Edward the Confessor, at the making of the book of Domesday, were ancient demesne, and all the rest frank-fee, wherewith Fitz-Herbert agrees. Reg. Orig. 12: F. N. B. 161. These lands were exempted from all services, but not from homage. Bro. tit. Demesne, 32. says, that land which is in the hands of the king or lord of any manor, or being ancient demesne of the crown (viz. the demesnes) is called frank-free; and that which is in the hands of the tenant, is ancient demesne only. The author of the Terms of the Law defines a free-fee to be a tenure pleadable at the common law; and not in ancient demesne. Cowel: Blount. See tit. Ancient Demesne.

FRANK-FOLD, see Foldage.

FRANK-LAW, libera lex.] The benefit of the fee and common law of the land. You may find what it is by the contrary, from Crompton in his Justice of Peace; where he says, he that for any offence lost his frank-law, falls into these mischiefs, viz.: he may never be impannelled upon any jury or assise; or be permitted to give any testimony. If he hath any thing to do in the king's courts, he must not attend them in person, but appoint his attorney therein for him; and his lands shall be estreated, and his body committed to prison, &c. Cromp. Juris. 156: Lib. Assis. 59.

FRANK-MARRIAGE, liberum maritagium.] A tenure in tail special where a man seised of land in fee-simple; gives it to another with his daughter, sister, &c., in marriage; to hold to them and their heirs. This tenure groweth from these words in the gift, i. e. sciant, &c. me A. B. dedisse et concessisse, &c. T. B. filio meo, &c. Annæ uxori ejus, filiæ, &c. in liberum maritagium, num messuagium, &c. Lit. § 17: West. Symb. par. 1. lib. 2. § 303. The effect of which words is, that they shall have the land to them and the heirs of their bodies: and shall do no services to the donor, except fealty, until the fourth degree. Glanvil. lib. 7. c. 18. And Fleta gives this reason why the heirs do no service until the fourth degree: Ne donatores vel corum hæredes per homagii receptionem a reversione repelantur. And why in the fourth descent and downward, they shall do services to the donor: quin in quarto gradu vehementer præsumitur, quod terra est pro defectu hæredum donatorum reversura Fleta, lib, 3. c. 11; and see Bracton, lib. 2. c. 7.

Bracton also divides marriages into liberum' maritagium, and maritagium servito obligatum; which last was where lands were given in marriage, with a reservation of the services to the donor, which the donee and his heirs were bound to perform for ever; but neither he, or the next two heirs, were obliged to do homage, which was to be done when it came to the fourth degree, and then, and not before, they were required to be performed, both services and homage. Bract. lib. 2. A gift of lands by one man to another with a wife in frank-marriage, amounts by implication of law to a gift in tail; which in this case may be created without the words heirs or body. Lit. 17: Wood's Inst. 120. A gift in frank-marriage might be made as well after as before marriage: and such a gift was a fee simple before the statute of Westm. 2; but since, it is usually a fee-tail. Though this tenure is now grown out of use, it is still capable of subsisting in law: it is liable to no service but fealty. See tit. Tail and

FRANK-PLEDGE, franci plegium, from Fr. franc, liber, and pledge, fidejussor.] A pledge or surety for the behaviour of freemen; it being the ancient custom of this kingdom, borrowed from the Lombards, that for the preservation of the public peace, every free born man at the age of fourteen (religious persons, clerks, &c. excepted) should give security for his truth towards the king and his subjects, or be committed to prison, whereupon a certain number of neighbours usually became bound one for another, to see each man of their pledge forthcoming at all times, or to answer the transgression done by any gone away: and whenever any one offended, it was forthwith inquired in what pledge he was, and then those of that pledge either produced the offender within one and thirty days, or satisfied for his offence. This was called frank-ford; and this custom was kept, that the sheriffs at every county court, did from time to time take the oaths of young persons as they grew to fourteen years of age, and see that they were settled in one decennary or other: whereby this branch of the sheriff's authority was called visus franci

At this day no man ordinarily giveth other security for the keeping of the peace, than his own oath; so that none answereth for the transgression of another, but every person for himself. 4 Inst. 78. Living under frank-pledge has been termed living under law, &c. See this Dict. tits. Court-leet, Decennary, Deciner.

FRATERIA. A fraternity, brotherhood, or society of religious persons, who were bound to pray for the good health, life, &c. of their living brethren, and the souls of those that were dead: in the statutes of the cathedral church of St. Paul in London, collected by Ralph Baldock, Dean, A. I. What Acts are fraudulent at Common Law and in Equity.

II. What Acts are fraudulent by Statute. III. Public Frauds punishable by Indictment at Common Law.

I. It may be laid down as a general rule, that, without the express provision of any act of parliament, all deceitful practices in defrauding, or endeavouring to defraud, another of his known right, by means of some artful device, contrary to the plain rules of common honesty, are condemned by the common law, and punishable according to the heinousness of the offence. Co. Lit. 3. b: Dyer, 295. Such as causing an illiterate person to execute a deed to his prejudice, by reading of it over to him in words different from those in which it was written, &c. 1 Sid. 312. 431.

Also it is a rule, that a wrongful manner of executing a thing shall avoid a matter that might have been executed lawfully. Co. Lit. 35: 41 Ass. 28: 47 Ass. 29: 1 Rol. Ab. 420. 549: Co. Lit. 357: Poph. 64, 100.

A deed not fraudulent at first may become so afterwards. And if one add a seal to a note which is good without it, he shall lose his security. 2 Vern. 123. 162

Where a person is party to a fraud, all that follows by reason of that fraud shall be said to be done by him. Cro. Jac. 4. 9. But when fraud is not expressly averred, it shall not be presumed; nor shall the court adjudge it to be so, till the matter is found by a jury. 10 Rep. 56.

All frauds and deceits, for which there is no remedy by the ordinary course of law, are properly cognisable in equity; and it is admitted, that matters of fraud were one of the chief branches to which the jurisdiction of Chancery was originally confined. 4 Inst. 84.

Wherever fraud or surprise can be imputed to, or collected from the circumstance of the transaction, equity will interpose and relieve against it. Toth. 101, 2: 2 Ch. Ca. 103: Finch. 161: 2 P. Wms. 203. 270: 3 P. Wms. 130: 2 Vern, 189: 2 Atk. 324: 2 Ves. 407. It is said, however, it must not be understood, from cases of this kind being generally brought into equity, that the courts of law are incompetent to relieve; for where the fraud can be clearly established, courts of law exercise a concurrent jurisdiction with courts of equity; and will relieve by making void the instrument obtained by such corrupt agreement or fraud. 1 Burr. 396: Wood's Inst. 296. Therefore where the obligor was an unlettered man, and the bond was not read over to him, he was allowed to plead this circumstance in an action on the bond. 9 H. 5. 15. cited 11 Co. 27. b. So if the bond be in part read to an unlettered man, and some of its material contents be omitted or misrepresented. 2 Rol. Ab. 28. p. 8. It is observable that Lord Coke in the same passage where he confines the jurisdiction of courts of equity to such "frauds covin and deceit, for which there is no remedy by the ordinary course of law, seems to admit that all frauds were not relievable at law. See 3 Inst. 84.

That a party prejudiced by a fraud may file a bill in equity for a discovery of all its | sale. 3 Madd. 417: Coop. Ca. 125: 2 Jac. circumstances is unquestionable; the invariable practice in such cases is to seek relief, and the issue directed is to furnish the ground upon which the court is to proceed in giving relief. Fonblanque's Treat. Eq. c. 2. § 3. in n.

The Chancery may decree a conveyance to be fraudulent merely for being voluntary, and without any trial at law; yet it has been insisted, that fraud or not was triable only by a jury. Pre. Ch. 14, 15.

Where a poor man was drawn in to sell an estate, at a great undervalue, but no fraud appearing, though the purchase was not a fair bargain, the seller could not be relieved in equity, to set it aside. Preced. Chanc. 206.

But the Court of Chancery will set aside a deed obtained by the keeper of a house of lunatics from a person residing under his care, though the party be not a lunatic at the time, on the general principle of inequality of station, like the cases of guardian and ward, attorney and client, &c. 13 Ves. 136. And so also a deed executed in favour of a person acting as agent for managing a lady's affairs, if undue influence appears. 14 Ves. 273.

There does not appear to be a single case in the books in which it has been held that mere inadequacy of price alone is a ground for a court of equity to annul an agreement, though executory, if the same appear to have been fairly entered into, and understood by the parties, and capable of being specifically performed; still less does it appear to have been considered as a ground for rescinding an agreement actually executed. See Gilb. Rep. 156: Bro. P. C. Keen v. Stukeley, 2 Atk. 251: Ambl. 18. To set aside a conveyance there must be an inequality of price so strong, gross, and manifest, that it must be impossible to state it to a man of common sense, without producing an exclamation at the inequality of it. I Bro. C. R. 9. and see 2 Bro. C. R. 179. in n. A strong argument in support of this rule may be drawn from those cases in which losing bargains have been actually established and decreed. See 2 Vern 423: 1 Eq. Abr. 170: 2 Vez. 422: 1 Bro. C. R. 158. But though courts of equity will not relieve against agreements merely on the ground of the consideration being inadequate, yet if there be such inadequacy as to show that the person did not understand the bargain he made, or was so oppressed that he was glad to make it, knowing its inadequacy, it will show a command over him which may amount to a fraud. 2 Bro. C. R. 175. See also 1 Bro. C. R. 558: Herne v. Meers, 2 Ves. 155: 2 P. Wms. 203: 3 Ves. & Bea. 187: 1 Cox's Rep. 278: 2 Madd. 430: 9 Ves. 246: 10 Ves. 219. 474: 2 Scho. & Lef. 488: 16 Ves. 517. So inadequacy of price coupled with distress of the vendors, and want of advice, is a ground for invalidating a

It seems agreed that if a woman on the point of marriage, charge, or convey her property to a mere stranger, for whom she was not under even a moral obligation to provide, that such a conveyance will be decreed a fraud on the marital rights. 2 C. R. 41: 2 Ves. 264.

Since the cases of Kerrich v. Bransby (Bro. P. C.) and Webb v. Cleverden (2 Atk. 424), it appears to have been settled that a will cannot be set aside in equity for fraud and imposition; because a will of personal estate may he set aside for fraud in the ecclesiastical court, and a will of real estate may be set aside at law: for in such cases, as the animus testandi is wanting, it cannot be considered as a will. 2 Atk. 324: 3 Atk. 17. Though equity will not set aside a will for fraud, nor restrain the probate of it in the proper court, yet if the fraud be proved, it will not assist the party practising it, but will leave him to make what advantage he can of it. 2 Vern. 76. But if the validity of the will has been already determined and acted upon, equity will restrain proceedings in the Prerogative Court, to controvert its validity. 1 Atk.

If a security be obtained from a person by fraud and practice, upon a pretence of a demand that is fictitious, it will be relieved against in equity. 2 Vern. 123. 632.

But no man can be allowed to allege his own fraud to avoid his own deed; and therefore when a deed of conveyance of an estate from one brother to another was executed to give the latter a colourable qualification to kill game; it was held that as against the parties to the deed it was valid and was sufficient to support an ejectment for the premises. Doe, d. Roberts v. Roberts, 2 B. & A. 367.

There are several instances where a parol agreement, intended to be reduced into writing, but prevented by fraud, has been decreed in equity, notwithstanding the statute of frauds and perjuries; as where upon a marriage treaty, instructions were given by the husband to draw a settlement, which he privately countermanded, and afterwards drew in the woman by persuasions and assurances of such settlement to marry him: it was decreed, that he should make good the settlement. 1 Eq. Abr. 19. So where a parol agreement was concerning the lending of money on a mortgage, and the covenants proposed were an absolute deed from the mortgagor, and a deed of defeasance from the mortgagee, and after the mortgagee had got the deed of conveyance, he refused to execute the defeasance; it was decreed against him on the point of fraud. 1 Eq. Abr. 90. See tit. Agreement.

Having said thus much generally on the nature of fraud, and the jurisdiction of the courts of law and equity, we will now shortly refer to the additional cases on the subject, which it seems convenient to arrange |

under the following heads:—
1. Acts prevented by fraud.—If a person be fraudulently prevented from performing any act, equity will consider the act as done. 1 Jac. & W. 94.

Where a copyholder, by his will, intending to give the greater part of his estate to his godson, and the other part to his wife, was persuaded by the wife to nominate her to the whole, on a promise that she would give the godson the part designed for him; it was decreed against the wife on the ground of fraud, though there was no memorandum of the agreement in writing pursuant to the statute of frauds. Preced. Chanc. 3.

And where a son promised to pay his father's legacies, if he would forbear to alter his will, such promise shall be enforced; 2 Freem. 34; wherein it is said to be the constant practice of the Court of Equity to make a decree on a promise of this nature.

So where a devisee prevented a testator from charging a legacy on his real estate by undertaking to pay it, he was held bound in equity, though not in law. 11 Ves. 638. Also where a tenant in tail was prevented from completing a recovery by the fraud of a person whose wife was entitled in remainder; the estate was treated in equity as if the recovery had been suffered, even in favour of a volunteer. Ibid.

2. Ignorance of rights.—Equity relieves against bargains made under misconception of rights. 1 Ves. 126.

If a party, ignorant of plain and settled principles of law, is induced to yield portion of his indisputable right, equity will give relief; but where his title is disputable, and he enters into a compromise, he will not be relieved, nor will the court inquire into the consideration, if it appear to have been taken after due deliberation. 1 Simon & St. 564, 5.

A conveyance obtained from a woman in ignorance of her rights, and upon misrepresentation of the circumstances of the pro-perty, was set aside, although she was of full age, and acquiesced in the sale, and had re-ceived the interest of the purchase money for twelve years; and although she had consulted her friends, and had their assent, they being in equal ignorance with herself. 2 Scho. & L. 474

So an agreement as to the distribution of personal estate was set aside, although ratified, the value appearing much greater than was known at the time. 1 Ves. 401.

Neither will family agreements be supported if founded on the mistake of either party, to which the opposite party is accessary; 3 Swans. 467. Nor will they be enforced where there is no proof of direct fraud, or undue influence, even after an acquiescence of five years, if it appear that a party surrendered an unimpeachable title without consideration, and evidence is given of his gross ignorance, habitual intoxication, liability to imposition, and want of professional advice. 1 Swanst. 137.

But a purchaser who has given full value for an estate, and without notice, shall not be prejudiced by the mistake of a party conveying a claim under a marriage settlement. 2 Atk. 8.

3. Concealment of value or title by parties purchasing, &c .-- In treaties for an agreement, concealment of a material fact by one one of the parties, in order to keep the other in ignorance, whereby to profit, is a gross fraud, and the contract will be set aside in equity. 1 Bro. P. C. 308. And where there has been a concealment on the part of the vendor, a specific performance will not be decreed. 1 Bro. C. C. 440. And if an attorney or agent, on the sale of an estate, does not disclose to the buyer an incumbrance, and leads him to suppose the title is good, he will be held liable to make satisfaction in default of the vendor. 1 Ves. 95. So concealment of a material fact by the person whose duty it was to disclose it, is sufficient to avoid a release so obtained by him. 1 Scho. & L. Also where a partner. who exclusively superintended the accounts of the concern, agreed to purchase his copartner's share, for a sum which he knew, from accounts in his possession, but which he concealed from his copartner, was an inadequate consideration; the agreement was

4. Concealment of title by parties lying by. 4.c.-Where a man conusant of his right suffers another to build on his ground without setting up a right till afterwards, the court will oblige him to permit the person building to enjoy quietly. 2 Atk. 83. Soit is a ground of relief against a remainderman who lies by and allows a tenant to build without giving him notice of his intention to impeach his title. 2 Sch. & L. 73.

If A. has a prior incumbrance on an estate, and is a witness to a subsequent mortgage, but does not disclose his own incumbrance; this is such a fraud in him for which his incumbrance shall be postponed. Vern. 151. And see 2 Vern. 554. So if A. having a mortgage on a leasehold estate, lends the mortgage deed to the mortgagor, with an intent to borrow more money; that is such a fraud in the mortgagee, for which his mortgage shall be postponed to the subsequent incumbrance. 2 Vern. 726: 1 Eq. Ab. 321. See this Dict. tit. Mortgage.

Where a mortgagee was present while the mortgagor was in treaty for his son's marriage, and fraudulently concealed his mortgage, he was held precluded from his claim. 2 Atk. 49. S. C.: Barn. 101.

So where a mother being absolute owner of a term, the same being limited to her in tail, was present at a treaty for her son's marriage, and heard her son declare, that the term was to come to him at his mother's death, and was a witness to the deed, whereby the reversion of the term was settled on | pending the treaty, made deceitful reprethe issue of the marriage after the mother's death; she was compelled in equity to make good the settlement. 2 Vern. 150.

Where the defendant, on a treaty of marriage for his daughter with the plaintiff, signed a writing comprising the terms of the agreement, and afterwards desiring to elude the force thereof, and get loose from his agreement, ordered his daughter to put on a good humour, and get the plaintiff to deliver up that writing, and then marry him, which she accordingly did, and the defendant stood by at the corner of a street to see them go by to be married; the plaintiff was relieved on the point of fraud. 1 Eq. Ab. 20: 2 Vern. 373.

So where a person, knowing his own title, does not give notice of it to a purchaser, although an infant, he shall not afterwards set it up. 9 Mod. 35. So a tenant in tail under a settlement encouraging a stranger to purchase an annuity charged on his estate by a will, which was void as against the settlement, was decreed to make the annuity

Where A. being tenant in tail, remainder to his brother B. in tail, A. not knowing of the intail, made a settlement on his wife for life for her jointure, without levying a fine, or suffering a recovery, which B. who knew of the intail ingrossed, but did not mention any thing of the intail, because, as he confessed, in his answer, if he had spoke any thing of it, his brother, by a recovery, might have cut off the remainder, and barred him: although after A.'s death B. recovered in ejectment against the widow by force of the intail; yet she was relieved in Chancery, and a perpetual injunction grant-ed for this fraud in B. in concealing the intail; for if it had been disclosed, the settlement might have been made good by a recovery. Preced. Chanc. 35: 2 Vern. 239.

5. Misrepresentation .- As to frauds in contracts and dealings, the common law subjects the wrong-doer, in several instances. to an action on the case; as if a person, having the possession of goods, sell them to another, affirming them to be his own, when in truth they are not, an action on the case lies. 1 Rol. Ab. 90: Cro. Jac. 474. But if A. possessed of term for years, offers to sell it to B. and says, that a stranger would have given him twenty pounds for this term, by which means B. buys it, though in truth A. was never offered twenty pounds, no action on the case lies, though B. is hereby deceived in the value. 1 Rol. Ab. 91. 101: 1 Sid. 146: Yelv. 20. S. P.

If on a treaty for the purchase of a house, the defendant affirms the rent to be more than it is, whereby the plaintiff is induced to give more than the house is worth, this is a fraud. 1 Salk. 211: 1 Lev. 102: 1 Sid. 146: 1 Keb. 510. 518. 522. S. P. And see Kel 24. 81: 1 Show. 50. 51.

sentations as to the amount of the business done at it, whereby the plaintiff was induced to give a large sum of money for it, it was held that the latter might sue for the deceitful representations, though not entered in the conveyance or agreement of sale. Dobell v. Stevens, 3 Barn & C. 625.

A misrepresentation of the value of an estate is a sufficient ground in equity to refuse a specific performance; 1 Bro. P. C. 211: 1 Mad. 80; even misrepresentation to a slight degree; 18 Ves. 10; but there is a distinction where it is urged as an objection to rescind the contract. Ibid.

A party obtaining an agreement by a partial misrepresentation is not entitled to a specific performance, on waiving the part affected by the misrepresentation. The effect of partial misrepresentation is not to alter or modify the agreement pro tanto, but to destroy it entirely, and to operate as a personal bar to the party who has practised 1 Jac. & W. 112.

Misrepresentation of a fact misleading others to deal for value upon the faith of it. is binding on the person making it. 3 V. & B. 111. And even if he make it through mistake, it shall bind him, if he might have had notice of it. 2 Bro. C. C. 338.

II. What Acts are fraudulent by Statute.— By stat. 1 Ric. 2. c. 9. no gift or feoffment of lands or goods shall be made by fraud for maintenance. And the disseisees shall have their recovery against the first disseisors as well of their lands as of double damages, without regard to such alienations. also stats. 4 H. 4. c. 7: 11 H. 6. c. 3: and this Dict. tits. Disseisin, Forcible Entry.

By stat. 3 H. 7. c. 4. (and see stat. 50 Ed. 3. c. 6.) all deeds of gift of goods made in trust for the use of persons making the said gifts, with intent to defraud creditors, shall be null and void.

By stat. 13 Eliz. c. 5. (made perpetual by stat. 29 Eliz. c. 5.) every feoffment, gift, alienation, and conveyance of lands or goods, leases, rents, &c. and every bond, judgment, and execution, with intent to defraud creditors, or others, shall (only against creditors and others whose actions shall be thereby defrauded or delayed) be of none effect; all parties and privies to such conveyances, bonds, &c. shall forfeit one year's value of the lands; and the whole of the goods, or money contained in the bond, &c. half to the crown and half to the party grieved; and suffer half a year's imprisonment. This statute not to extend to any estate made on good consideration bond fide to persons not having notice of such fraud. As to determinations on this act, see

By stat. 27 Eliz. c. 4. (made perpetual by stat. 39 Eliz. c. 18.) every conveyance, Where the vendor of a public-house, | charge, lease, or incumbrance, of any lands shall be deemed utterly void as against such | previous to its passing; and the remedy purchasers and all claiming under them. The parties and privies to such conveyances shall forfeit one year's value of the land, and suffer half a year's imprisonment. The statute expressly excepts any conveyance made for good consideration and bond fide. If any person shall make any conveyance or limitation of lands with a clause of revocation, and after such conveyance shall convey or charge the same lands for money or other good consideration, the said first conveyance against the said vendees shall be void. Lawful mortgages made bond fide on good consideration are excepted. By the same act statutes merchant and statutesstaple are to be entered in the office of the clerk of the recognizances. See this Dict those titles.

By stat. 29 Car. 2. c. 3. (known more commonly by the name of The Statute of Frauds, and by which various provisions are made as to contracts, wills, &c. which see in this Dict. under tits. Agreement, Assumpsit, Trusts, Wills, &c.) all leases, estates of freehold, or terms for years, or any uncertain interest in lands, made by livery and seisin only, or by parol, and not put in writing and signed by the parties or their agents, shall have the force of leases at will only. cept leases not exceeding the term of three years at two thirds of the improved value. And no leases, estates, or interests of lands, either of freehold or terms of years, or any uncertain interest, not being copyhold, shall be assigned, granted, or surrendered, unless by deed or note in writing signed by the parties or their agents; or by the operation of law.

By stat. 3 (or 3 and 4) W. & M. c. 14. continued by stat. 6 W. 3. c. 14. all wills or appointments of lands, or of any rent, &c. out of the same should be deemed, only as against creditors by bond or specialty binding the heir, to be fraudulent and void. And every such creditor should have his action of debt upon his bonds and specialties against the heir at law of such obligators, and such devices jointly. This statute, however, excepted dispositions for the payment of debts and raising portions for children in pursuance of marriage contracts made before marriage: it further provided, that where any heir at law should be liable to pay his ancestor's debt, in respect of lands descended to such heir, and aliened the same before action brought, he shall be answerable to the creditor in an action of debt to the value of the land aliened; but the lands bond fide aliened before action brought should not be liable. Every devisee made liable by the statute should be chargeable, in the same manner as the heir, though the lands devised should be aliened before action brought.

By the 1 W. 4. c. 47. the two last-mentioned acts, and also the 4 Anne, c. 5. and the 47 G. 3. c. 74. are repealed, except so far | Treat. Eq. c. 4. § 12. in notes.

made with intent to defraud purchasers, as they affect the estates of persons who died given to creditors by bond or specialty by the former statutes is extended to creditors by covenant See further tit. Real Estate.

The stats. 50 Ed. 3. c. 6: 3 H. 7. c. 4. expressly declare all gifts, &c. of goods and chattels intended to defraud creditors, to be null and void: creditors might, however, still in some cases be defrauded, by their debtors executing powers of appointment (vested in them by settlement, &c.) in favour of mere volunteers, unless courts of equity interposed, and made such voluntary appointment in the first place subject to payment of debts. 2 Vern. 319. 465: 2 Vez. 1. But though courts of equity will subject a voluntary appointment to payment of debts, yet they will not interfere where the debtor has not executed his power of appointment. 2 Vern. 465: 2 Vez. 1. See also Hob. 9. as to the rule of law.

As the stat. 13 Eliz. c. 5. not only declares all deeds made in fraud of creditors to be null and void, but subjects the parties to such fraud, to the penalties and forfeitures above mentioned, it should seem that the provisions of this act ought to be construed strictly; but Lord Mansfield has said that the stats. 13 Eliz. c. 5: 27 Eliz. c. 4 cannot receive too liberal a construction, or be too much extended in suppression of fraud.

Согор. 434. The object of the legislature was evidently to protect creditors from those frauds which are frequently practised by debtors under the pretence of discharging a moral obligation: for as to those gifts or conveyances which want even a good or meritorious consideration for their support, their being voluntary seems to have been always a sufficient ground to conclude that they were fraudulent: but though the statute protects the legal right of creditors against the fraud of their debtors, it anxiously excepts from such imputation the bond fide discharge of a moral duty. It therefore does not declare all voluntary conveyances, but all fraudulent conveyances, to be void: and whether the conveyance be fraudulent or not is declared to depend on the consideration being good, and also bond fide. 1 Ch. Ca. 99. 291: 1 Vent. 194: 1 Mod. 119: 1 Ath. 15. Cowp.

A good consideration is that of blood, or of natural love and affection. See this Dict. tit. Consideration. A gift made for such consideration ought certainly to prevail, unless it be found to break in upon the legal rights of others; in that case it is equally clear it ought to be set aside. If therefore a man being indebted convey to the use of his wife or children, such conveyance would be within the statute; for though the consideration be good, yet it is not bond fide; that is, the circumstances of the grantor render it inconsistent with the good faith which is due to his creditors. Fonblanque's

And where a father refused, on his son's marriage, to enable him to make a settlement, unless provision was made by the settlement for his brothers and sisters, these persons were held not to be mere volunteers, for though not within the consideration of marriage, they were within the agreement between the father and son, and therefore the settlement was not void as to them within the statutes. 18 Ves. 92: 2 Atk 189.

If there be a voluntary conveyance of real estate or chattel interest by one not indebted at the time, though he afterwards becomes indebted, if that voluntary conveyance was for a child, and there is no particular evidence or badge of fraud to deceive subsequent creditors, that will be good; but if any mark of fraud collusion, or intent to deceive subsequent cre-

But the grantor's not being indebted is not the only badge of fraud; several other circumstances are enumerated in Twyne's Case (3 Rep.) as furnishing a strong presumption that the transaction is mala fide. Benton v. Thornhill, 7 Taunton, 149.

A creditor having taken in execution the goods of a defendant who had confessed judgment, and having bought them by public auction, and taken a bill of sale for a valuable consideration from the sheriff, and let the goods to the former owner for a rent which was actually paid, has a title which cannot be favourable to such purpose is that which eximpugned as fraudulent by other creditors having executions against the same defendants.

Want of possession accompanying a conveyance of chattels does not of itself constitute fraud, and avoid the deed as against creditors; it is only evidence (or as the cases term it, a badge,) of fraud. Therefore, where a bill of sale of household furniture given as a security for a boná fide advance of money; provided, that if the debtor should repay the money by instalments in certain days, the deed should be void; but in default of such payment, the creditor might take possession and sell the goods; the deed was held not to be fraudulent as against a judgment creditor, by reason of the debtor remaining in possession, being given for a good consideration, and vour of purchasers with notice, were traced, his continuance in possession being provided it would probable appear to have originated in

See 2 Lev. 105. The policy of the act was to prevent fraud; the construction most cludes all temptation to the practice of it. A voluntary deed, as has already been noticed, is binding on the party and all claiming under him as subsequent volunteers; and to allow him to defeat his bounty in favour of a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice is merely to prefer a higher consideration; but to allow a purchaser with notice to supersede the claims of a volunteer seems to encourage a breach of the respect morally due to the fair claims and interests of others; and may render the provisions of a statute, intended by the legislature to be preventive of fraud, the most effectual instrument of accomplishing it. This point seems deserving of consideration; for if the construction of this act which has certainly prevailed in fathe opinion, that the statute avoids all volun-

FREIGHT, Fr. fret.] The money paid for carriage of goods by sea; or in a larger sense, it is taken for the price paid for the use of a ship to transport goods; and for the cargo, or burthen of the ship. Ships are freighted right to detain something of which the party either by the ton, or by the great: and in respect of time, the freight is agreed for, at so to freight, the merchant charterer was conmuch per month, or at a certain sum for the whole voyage. If a ship freighted by the great, happens to be cast away, the freight is lost; but if a merchant agrees by the ton, or at so much for every piece of commodities, though by the language of the charterparty, and by any accident the ship is cast away, if it may be expressed that the owner or master part of the goods is saved, it is said she ought lets the ship to freight, this phrase does not to be answered her freight pro rata: and when necessarily import that the possession of the a ship is insured and such a misfortune ship is given up and taken by the charterer. happens, the insured commonly transfer those And the result of the cases seems to be, that goods over to the assurers, towards a satisfac- this must depend upon the terms of the intion of what they make good. An entire ship was chartered for a voyage out and home, and by the terms of the charterparty, the merchant covenanted to pay for the homeward cargo at certain rates per ton, on delivery of the cargo at Liverpool, by bills at three months, to load a full cargo, and to pay demurrage, and he bound the goods to the performance of his covenants: decided the owner could not detain the goods, either for the freight of such as were put on board, but afterwards re-landed on compulsion, or for dead freight, or for demurrage. 3 M. & S. And a bill filed in Chancery, to obtain a declaration that the shipowners were entitled to a lien in equity, was dismissed. 2 Mer. 401.

By another charterparty, containing the same obligatory clause, an entire ship was let to freight for a voyage out and home, at a definite sum, payable by instalments, in the progress and at the end of the voyage: held, the owner could not detain the goods for the payment of the money. 7 Taunt. 14: 2 Marsh. 339. S. C.

In each of these two cases the goods belonged to the charterer himself, who had become bankrupt. The latter was decided upon consideration of the nature of a lien, as being has possession; and as the entire ship was let sidered to be the owner pro tempore, and the goods on board to be in his possession, and not of the owner, who had let out the ship.

Where payment is to be made by approved bills, if the owner object to a bill delivered to him, but afterwards negociate it, he thereby loses the benefit of his objection, and his right to detain the goods. 3 B. & A. 497.

The master of a ship has not a lien on the freight for his wages, nor for his disbursements on account of his ship during the voyage, nor for premiums paid by him abroad for the purpose of procuring the cargo. Ca. 75: 2 Vern. 212: and also Dougl. 541, 542. that where a ship perishes, the whole freight from the last place or time

By charterparty the freighter covenanted to pay to the owner freight, at and after a rate per ton per month for six months at least, and so on in proportion for further time, till her discharge or being lost, &c. to be paid as follows, viz. so much as might be earned on arrival of the ship at her destined port abroad, within ten days after her arrival there, and the remainder at specified periods. This was held to constitute one entire covenant, and that the arrival of the ship at her outward bound port was a condition precedent to the owner's right to recover any freight: and therefore the ship being lost on her outward voyage, the owner was not entitled to recover uny portion of freight. 2 B. & A. 17.

If a freighted ship becomes disabled without the master's fault, he has his option to refit (if possible, in convenient time), or to hire another ship to carry the goods. If the merchant will not agree to this, the master is entitled to the full freight for the whole voyage.

1 Bl. Rep. 190.

goods saved. 2 Burr. 882.

And further, as to the cases in which the owner of the ship is entitled to secover freight pro rata, where only part of the goods are conveyed to their destination, or the whole voyage is not performed, see Abbott on Ship.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES. Associations, chiefly among the most industrious of the lower and middling class of tradesmen, for the purpose of affording each other relief in sickness, and their widows and children some assistance at their death. These have been thought worthy the protection of the legislature to prevent frauds which had arisen from the irregular principles on which many of them were conducted. For this purpose were passed the 33 G. 3, c. 54: 35 G. 3, c. 111: 43 G. 3. c. 111: 49 G. 3. c. 125: and 59 G. 3. c. 128.

By the 10 G. 4.c. 56. which extends to Great Britain and Ireland, all of the above, as well as the Irish statutes (35 G. 3. c. 111. § 1: and 36 G. 3. c. 58.) are repealed after the expiration of three years, or on existing societies previously conforming to the act. § 1.40. The following is a short outline of its provisions:-any number of persons may form themselves into a society, and raise among themselves a fund for their mutual benefit, and make and alter rules, impose fines, &c. § 2. Societies shall declare in their rules the purpose of their establishment, &c.; and direct the uses to which the money subscribed shall be appropriated; and may impose penalty on treasurer, &c. for misapplication of money. & 3. The rules of every society shall be submitted to, and approved by, the barrister appointed to certify the savings' banks in England, to the lord advocate or his deputies in Scotland, and to a barrister appointed by the attorney-general in Ireland (unless they are copies of approved rules of other societies already inrolled under the act of the same county), and deposited with clerk of the peace, to be confirmed by justices at sessions, and the involment certified by clerk of the peace § 4. an appeal is given to the sessions in case of rules being rejected by the barrister, &c. § 5. Rules are not to be allowed, unless justices are satisfied with the tables of payment to the members. § 6. No society is to be entitled to the benefit of this act until their rules have been entered in a book for the inspection of all the members, &c., and a transcript thereof deposited with the clerk of the peace § 7. Rules, when entered and deposited, binding on the members, and a copy of the transcript is to be received in evidence. § 8. No confirmed rule to be altered but at a general meeting of the society, &c. § 9. Rules shall specify place of meeting and duties of officers; but societies may alter their place of meeting on giving seven days' notice in writing to the clerk of the peace. § 10. FURR, furrura, from the Fr. fourer, i. c. pelluntare. The coat or covering of a beast. The stat. 24 H. S. c. 13, mentions different kinds of it, viz. sables; which are a rich fur, of a beast called a suble, of bigness between a pow-cat and an ordinary cat, bred in Russia and Tartary. Lucerus, the skin of a beast of that name, near the size of a wolf, in colour neither red nor brown, but between both, and mingled with black spots; which are bred in Muscovy; and is a very rich fur. Genets, a beast's skin so called, in bigness between a cat and a weazle, nailed like a cat, and of that nature; and of two kinds, black and grey, the black most precious, which hath black spots upon it hardly to be seen; this beast is the product of Spain. Foins are of fashion like FURCARE AD TASSUM. To pitch corn the sable, the top of the fur is black, and the ground whitish; bred for the most part in France. Marten is a beast very like the sabl, the skin something coarser, produced in England and Ireland, and all countries not too was at the disposal of his lord for life and cold; but the best are in Ireland. Besides these, there are the fitch or pole-cat; the calabar, a little teast, in bigness near a squirrel; municer, being the bellies of squirrels; and stanks, or what is called budge, &c. all of furigeldum reddiderunt, i. e. who never were them furs of torcign countries, some whereof make a large branch of their inland traffic.
